

School of Theology at Claremont

1001 1328074

The Library
SCHOOL OF THEOLOGY AT CLAREMONT

WEST FOOTHILL AT COLLEGE AVENUE
CLAREMONT, CALIFORNIA

REC
A/114 165/117

~~H/118~~

~~CP/118 70~~

~~CP/118 174~~

~~L/121 12~~

~~S/113~~

~~B/118~~

~~f2~~

A/123

CP/116

L/151

p/124

Digitized by the Internet Archive in 2021 with funding from Kahle/Austin Foundation

THE RELIGION OF ANCIENT GREECE

81
25

LQR
L6001/2

THE RELIGION
" OF
ANCIENT GREECE
Religja Grecji starożytnej
An Outline

BY THADDEUS ZIELIŃSKI
" "

Translated from the Polish with the author's co-operation
by GEORGE RAPALL NOYES

OXFORD UNIVERSITY PRESS
LONDON: HUMPHREY MILFORD

1926

TABLE OF CONTENTS

CHAPTER	PAGE
I. INTRODUCTION - - - - - The part played by the religion of ancient Greece in the consciousness of modern society.—Survivals from French classicism.—Survivals from the epoch of neohumanism.—Scientific research on the religion of ancient Greece.—Problem of the present sketch. Difficulty of this problem.—Lack of canonical books.—Lack of a special theological literature.—Our statement of the question.—Religious feeling and sectarianism.	I
II. THE DEIFICATION OF NATURE - - - The feeling for nature in ancient times and to-day.—Deities of springs, rivers, groves and trees, mountain pastures: the nymphs, the satyrs, Pan. Deities of the sea: Posidon, the nereids, the tritons, Proteus, Glaucus, the sirens. Deities of the sky: Zeus, Helios, Selene, the stars, the winds. Zeus and the Earth.—The cult of Mother Earth.	15
III. THE CONSECRATION OF WORK - - - The attitude of the Greeks towards work.—The relation of work to religion.—The work of a society of hunters: Artemis.—Humane treatment of animals. The work of a pastoral society: Hermes, Apollo.—‘The bull-slaying.’	38

The work of an agricultural society: Demeter, Dionysus, Pallas.

The work of the artisan: Pallas, Hephaestus.

The work of the merchant: Hermes, Posidon, the Delphinia and Pyanepsia.

Intellectual work: the Muses.—The religion of ancient Greece as a religion of joy.

IV. THE REVELATION OF GOD IN BEAUTY - 62

Immanent and transcendent animatism.—The rise of the divine image.—Imperfect realization of the beautiful: Daedalus.

Gradual process to perfection: the ripe archaic, Phidias, Polyclitus.—Their significance as prophets of the chisel.—Praxiteles, Lysippus.—Creation of the divine types.

'Idolatry' and 'fetishism.'—The arguments of Christian, Jewish, and ancient philosophical apologetics.

Architecture: the temples.—Sculpture and painting.

The choreia, as an adornment of religious services.—The dance; its disappearance.—Music and poetry.—Agonistics.

V. THE CONSECRATION OF HUMAN SOCIETY - 90

The family and its hearth.—Hestia, Zeus of the Garth, the souls of ancestors.—Marriage as a sacrament: Demeter, Hera, Artemis.—Family and servants.

The clan, the phratry, and the tribe.—Corporations and groups.

The state.—Pallas of the Citadel.—Public festivals.—Relation of the state to private religious feeling.—The condemnation of Socrates.—Tolerance.—The cult of souls and of heroes.

CONTENTS

ix

PAGE

National unity: the amphictyony.—The national games.—Heralds, supplication, bonds of hospitality.

The unity of all humanity.

VI. THE REVELATION OF GOD IN GOODNESS - 122

God and good; gradual approximation of these concepts.—Apollo and the cult of purity; the conception of pollution.—The danger of ritualism and the overcoming of it.

The fear of God and the love of God.

Sacrifices of supplication and of expiation.—Prayer and its development.

Rewards and punishments of the deity.—In this world: phylonomism and ontonomism.—Alastor.

In the other world.—Heroization.—The Eleusinian mysteries.

The orgies of Dionysus and ecstasy.—Orpheus and his mysteries.

VII. RELIGIOUS PHILOSOPHY - - - - 157

The philosophy of the ancient theogonies: quarrels and copulations.

The parable of the revelation in the word.—Monotheism and polytheism.—Plato.—The ideas and the soul.—Beauty and love.

The gods in Plato.—Fate and law.—God and matter.—The daemons and love.

Aristotle.—Motion and thought.—Reason and happiness.—The several stages of the soul.

Epicurus.—Materialistic monism.—The world and the gods.—The problem of Job.—The decline of phylonomism.

The Stoa.—Evolutionary pantheism.—Fire in the universe.—The gods of Stoicism.—The rational soul.—The idea of providence.—Its (or Jove) and Hera (or Juno), about the stern Pallas (or Minerva) and the dissolute Aphrodite (or Venus), about the warlike Mars and the cunning Mercury.

His ideas were definite, certainly ; but were they correct ? That is the question. And one must answer : No, absolutely incorrect. The very popularity of Greek mythology was the most potent barrier to the understanding of Greek religion ; it was one of the principal causes of the fact that men refused to take the Greek religion, as such, seriously. The tone was set by Ovid, the singer of Roman gallantry of the epoch of Augustus, which was so closely akin in its temper to the age of the French roi soleil ; and in the gorgeous garden of his Metamorphoses one could find any perfume that he might desire—except that of religion. Think of the incorrigible seducer, Jove, of the jealous and quarrelsome Juno, of Mercury, the master of thievish tricks, of the coquette Venus, of the tipsy Bacchus—what room is there for religion in such material ?

This, I repeat, is our heritage from one epoch, that of French classicism. Its injurious influence was partially neutralized at the end of the eighteenth and the beginning of the nineteenth century, during the epoch of the so-called neohumanism of Winckelmann, Goethe, and Schiller. A reaction set in, but mainly on an aesthetic foundation. The Zeus of Phidias, even in those later humble reproductions which were all that Winckelmann was acquainted with, is at all events not the voluptuous magnate of Ovid ; and Goethe had good cause to admire the spouse of Zeus, the Hera ascribed to Polyclitus, in whom he felt a breath ' as of a poem of Homer '. And yet this reaction, the most eloquent expression of which was the ardent hymn of Schiller in honour of The Gods of Greece, was of an exclusively aesthetic character. The ancient deities, revealing themselves in beauty, were contrasted with the peculiarly spiritual nature of Christianity ; and when Goethe in an unforgettable scene represented his tortured Gretchen in prayer before the Mater Dolorosa :

Incline, O Maiden,
Thou sorrow-laden,
Thy gracious countenance upon my pain !—
[Tr. TAYLOR]

it never even entered his mind that she was really invoking the immediate successor of a goddess of old times, the type of all women who are in affliction, Demeter.

Only through exact studies of the ancient world could Greek religion receive just appreciation ; such studies were naturally pursued in the mysteries of classical philology, the science of the ancient world. Proper methods were not found at once : some studies led the investigators astray ; others, though good in themselves, nevertheless did not lead to the goal which we have here in view. The ardour of the times of Winckelmann, joined with the mysticism of Swedenborg and Cagliostro, produced a brilliant flowering of ancient Greek 'symbolism' (Sainte-Croix, Creuzer), and this in turn called forth an extreme reaction in the spirit of the obsolete 'enlightenment', after which men hesitated to breathe a word of the grace conferred by the Eleusinian mysteries. The relatively rich material furnished by the study of the sacred books of India and Iran raised in a pressing form the question of the origin of Greek ideas about the gods; this was ordinarily answered by a theory of physical monism, which had as its point of departure the phenomena of light (the 'solar theory' of Max Müller and others) or of the atmosphere (Forchhammer). But, not to speak of indubitable errors and narrowness, it is evident that the Greek religion, as such, could only be obscured by all these interpretations. Even if it be true that the original Pallas Athena was a thunder-cloud, as is very likely, nevertheless such was not the nature of that Athena who, according to the religious conceptions of Solon, held over his country her protecting arms and by her magnanimous intercession saved it from destruction. It is evident that the methods of the 'historical school', which studied the development of cults in the early epochs of the wanderings and crossings of the Greek tribes, also failed to lead directly to an explanation of the inner nature of the Greek religion ; and if, notwithstanding this, the name of the founder of the school, Otfried Müller, must be mentioned with honour as that of one of the chief hierophants of Hellenism, this is because he managed to unite, both in his books on the history of the Greek tribes and in his edition of the Eumenides of Aeschylus, the genetic aim of his work with service to the problem of which we are now speaking.

Much light has now been thrown on these matters ; among classical philologists a just estimate of the religion of ancient Greece is an accomplished fact. When—to mention only two of its leading students—Erwin Rohde says that both the deepest and the boldest thoughts about divinity arose in ancient Greece, and when Wilamowitz calls the Hellenes ‘ the most devout nation of the world ’, the nature of the transformation that has taken place in our views of Greek religion becomes clear. And yet, in the first place, this new conception has not yet become generally known among educated people ; and, in the second place, a detailed portrayal of the Greek religion remains, as before, a problem for the future. Naturally it must rest on an historic foundation ; but though works exist which proudly call themselves histories of Greek religion, they are at best only good collections of materials. The present writer has not lost hope that it may be granted him to supply this pressing need ; the spirit in which he plans to do so is shown by the corresponding chapters in his short History of Ancient Culture. His present problem is different : the historic point of view is set aside ; the topic will be the essence of Greek religion in the flourishing epoch of the Greek people.

But where shall we find this ' essence ' of the Greek religion ?

The answer is beset with difficulties ; and in these very difficulties lies the internal cause of that lack of acquaintance of the educated classes of Europe with the Greek religion of which I have been speaking.

Where shall we find the essence of Christianity ? In the Gospels.—The essence of Judaism ? In the Torah and the Prophets.—The essence of Islam ? In the Koran. These are all canonical books, every verse of which is characteristic and authoritative in the opinion of the adherents of these different religions. Their rise was due to the existence of a founder of a religion and of a powerful priesthood, which maintained the real or fancied purity of its teaching free from foreign ingredients. These two elements were lacking in the religion of ancient Greece ; this fact constitutes its strength, but at the same time its weakness. The very concept of a ' canon ' in this field was absolutely foreign to the freedom-loving spirit of the Hellene. Quite properly the Fathers of the Church called Hellenism 'the father of all heresies'; the word 'heresy' means 'choice', and the right of choice was for a Hellene the inseparable mark of intellectual liberty. Of what sort is the 'nature' of the deity? Is that being something purely spiritual, non-material? Or is it merely woven of the most subtle, imperishable substance, of the 'heavenly ether', and therefore not subject to change of material, not requiring food or drink or sleep? Or finally, is it in general like man, except that it has in its veins not blood, but 'ichor', that it feeds not on bread but on nectar and ambrosia, and therefore does not grow old and does not die? All these views were expressed; every man could regard as correct the view which for him was most intelligible and congenial; and any man would have become a laughing-stock if it had occurred to him to invoke the thunders of heaven and earth on the head of a person who thought and believed differently from himself. But, on the other hand, when the full moon of the month of Hekatombaion shines in the heavens, then every Athenian will go forth into the streets, up to the Acropolis, that he may gaze on the solemn procession of old men, youths and maidens as it passes through the Propylaea to the temple of Athena of the Citadel; his heart will throb with holy emotion at the notes of the ancient hymn in her honour—'Hail to thee, dread goddess, amid the din of battle' (compare Aristophanes, Clouds 967)—and happy will be the man who beholds his young daughter among the maidens carrying baskets to the goddess.

So there is no canonical book, or Bible, for the Hellenic religion. Neither is there any such rich theological literature as comes to the aid of the investigator of the religion of India, Egypt or Babylon. The absence of it, to be sure, is not organic, but accidental. Like other religions, that of Greece was revealed—that is, regarded itself as revealed; it had its theophanies and its prophets. But the theophanies, in so far as they expressed themselves in the revelation of ceremonies and teachings, led to the establishment of secret, mystical cults, which became hereditary in the family of their elect founder. Thus Demeter revealed herself to the royal pair in Eleusis, Celeüs and Metanira, and her ‘mysteries’ became hereditary in the line of the Eumolpidae—their secret was never disclosed. Of prophets ancient Greece knew not a few—I am thinking of prophets in the true sense of the word, not of soothsayers—from mythical times to the full bloom of the historical epoch: Melampus, Orpheus, Musaeus, Hesiod, Epimenides of Crete, Pythagoras, Empedocles, Diotima. And there existed a rich literature, in verse and prose, which proceeded directly or indirectly from them. But for us, alas, almost nothing of this literature has been preserved; so we shall never find in it the essence of the Greek religion.

Where then ?

Everywhere—and therein lies the enormous difficulty of our problem.

First of all, in the whole of Greek literature, without exception : as a matter of fact there is not a single branch of it to which we do not owe some important evidence in the sphere of the questions that interest us. Literature, however, bears the stamp of the individuality of the authors who create it ; therefore, that we may check its evidence by the point of view of the ‘ average Greek ’, great importance attaches to epigraphic evidence : the edicts of communes in religious matters or matters bordering on religion, the expression of the religious feelings of common citizens on grave stones, votive offerings, and the like. And finally it is obvious that the plastic tradition—statues, bas-reliefs, wall-paintings and vase-paintings—is of first-rate importance for such a religion as the Greek ; one need only remember that this was what opened the eyes of Winckelmann and his disciples to that religion.

I have called enormous, the difficulty that results from this abundance of sources ; as a matter of fact, it lies not only in the necessity of mastering this wide-spread material, but also in the variety and inconsistency of the evidence gained from it. The Arcadian shepherds flogged with nettles the statue of their god Pan, if they were disappointed in their hopes of a treat from the farmer for whom they worked: is that 'Greek religion'? Most assuredly, seeing that the Arcadians were Greeks. Socrates prayed to the gods to send him good, even if he should not ask for it, and not to send him evil, even if he should ask for it: is that also 'Greek religion'? Evidently so, seeing that Socrates was a Greek. And between these two poles what a many-coloured rainbow of dark and light tints of religious feeling! How shall we escape from being blinded by this bewildering mixture of varied shades?

The ancients themselves propounded this question and replied to it—in about the third century before Christ—in the following manner. Not one religion exists, but three, which are binding in unequal measure. In the first place, poetic religion, otherwise called mythology. It binds no one; and besides, every man by means of allegorical interpretation may blend with his religious consciousness, this or that branch of it, and thereby transfer it to the sphere of the second religion. This religion is philosophical religion. It does not form a single whole: the Academy understands the nature of the gods in one way, the Lyceum in another, the Stoa in yet a third, and Epicurus in a fashion widely different from all others. Here also there is no sort of binding obligation: every man, availing himself of the right of choice (hairesis) that is offered him, may follow the course that attracts him and at the same time be free to go nowhere at all, if nothing attracts him. The punishment for an improper choice will be spiritual dissatisfaction, the punishment for failure to choose will be spiritual poverty; but a preacher would be laughed to scorn if he should start to threaten 'dissenters' with eternal tortures in the other world. And finally there is a third religion, the citizen's religion; this really binds the citizen, as such. But it binds him only to share in the cults of the state as a whole, not hampering his conscience with any dogma—thus even here there was no religious compulsion and oppression. When he is elected archon, an Athenian citizen on a certain day casts a pinch of incense on the blazing altar of Artemis: on the part of a religious man this act signified: 'I believe in Artemis'; on the part of an unbeliever: 'I fulfil the duty of an archon of the Athenian people'. And one must call fanatic, not the man who in the given conditions was obedient to the ancient custom, but the man who could even think of protesting against this innocent obedience.

As the reader sees, these three religions answer more or less to what we now call the narrative, dogmatic, and ceremonial aspects of a single religion. This is the reason why in the present sketch we cannot restrict our field to only one of them, even to the most binding of the three, the citizen's religion: if we did, our picture would be incomplete.

But since it is still less possible to include all the manifestations of the religious feelings of the Greeks in this short sketch, there is, I think, only one absolutely satisfactory solution of our problem. Let us transfer ourselves, believing Christians of the educated classes, into the Athens of the fifth and fourth centuries before Christ, and strive to answer this query: What would be our own faith, if with our own souls and their needs we were living in those times? Obviously we should observe the festivals piously ordained by our fathers, and our magnanimous patroness aloft on the Acropolis would find in us her most ardent votaries; we should be initiated into the blessed mysteries of Demeter of Eleusis with their profound teachings and with their ceremonies that exalt the spirit; as schoolboys we should study thoroughly all of Homer, but of course we should never doubt that if Zeus threatens Hera with a beating, the meaning is only that the sky, clad in clouds, scourges with its thunders the expanse of the air; regularly on the days of the Great Dionysia we should go to see the tragedies of our great poets, Aeschylus, Sophocles, and Euripides, for our wise magistrate Lycurgus has given heed that they shall not disappear from the orchestra and the stage of Dionysus; but we should also listen with attention to the inspired teachings of the pupils of Plato in the Academy, to the subtle discussions of Aristotle and his school in the Lyceum, to the eloquent, but diffuse lectures of Zeno in the 'Painted Porch' (Stoa Poikilē), and from time to time we should glance into the tempting 'garden' of the noble sceptic Epicurus. And all these elements would enter into our faith—into what for us forms the essence of the 'religion of ancient Greece', as set forth in this book.

The reader must not be surprised that I address myself not merely to the educated man, but to the educated believer—it matters not whether he believes with mind or heart or memory. It is exceedingly strange that I am the first student to formulate a principle which soon, I hope, will become a truism: 'As a man bereft of artistic feeling cannot understand Greek art, so one who lacks religious feeling cannot understand Greek religion.' Religious feeling is a magic wand that trembles every time we pass by the pure gold of religious faith, but is not stirred by lead or tinsel. Whoever possesses it will easily orient himself in the labyrinth of legends and ceremonies of ancient Greece; whoever does not possess it will find no aid in erudition. The imposing work of Otto Gruppe may serve as an awful example; it is unbelievably exhaustive; it is one of the works that are indispensable for every investigator of our field. But at the same time—it is all that any one could desire except religion: its contents could never be an object of faith for any man. Being himself an atheist, the author feels no difference between the living and the dead in those phenomena which are entitled 'Greek religion'.

To be sure, the other extreme, fanaticism, is no less barren. Any one who regards as pagans and infidels all men of another faith, had best not touch Greek religion. Here too art may serve as an analogy. Not only the man bereft of artistic feeling, but also the man who is exclusively and unreservedly devoted to one of several hostile tendencies in art, will prove incapable of appreciating the works of the Greek chisel.

Thus, reader, we have made a compact. I pray you light in your heart the bright torch of religious feeling and leave at home the dim rush-light of sectarianism : then the majestic temple of Greek religion will show you its marvels.

II

THE DEIFICATION OF NATURE

FOR the ancient Greek a consciousness of the mysterious life of the nature that surrounded him was perhaps the deepest foundation of his religious feeling. A consciousness not only of life, but of life infused with spirit ; and not only with spirit, but with divinity. For a man of our own times this is a matter which requires explanation before all others.

The expression ' life ' must be understood in a different sense from that in which we usually contrast ' living ' nature, that is, the organic world of animals and plants, with ' dead ' nature, that is, the inorganic mineral kingdom. For the consciousness of the Greek, dead nature did not exist ; all nature was life, spirit, divinity. It was divine not only in its meadows and forests, in its springs and rivers, but equally divine in the measureless, surging expanse of its seas and in the silent immobility of its mountain wastes. And in these last even more than elsewhere. Here, where our attention is not absorbed by the separate lives of the groves and glades, here more strongly do we feel the one united life of the goddess herself, the imperishable source of all those separate lives, the great mother—Earth. She is worshipped amid the white crags, ‘goddess of the hills, all-fostering Earth, mother of Zeus most high’ (Sophocles, Philoctetes, 391 : tr. Jebb).

One of the Russian poets, Lermontov, in his beautiful lyric, ‘When the yellowing meadow waveth’, has almost succeeded in attaining this feeling. Yet he has stopped half way. I perceive his failure in the last line of the poem : ‘And I see God in the heavens’. Here one feels the poison introduced by Judaism into Christianity, and through it into the souls of the heirs of Hellenism. Why ‘in the heavens’? Is it there that ‘the yellowing meadow waveth’? Thus in very truth the religion of the Old Testament violently tears our natural feeling of gratitude away from that which immediately calms and caresses us, and diverts it to a hypothetical Creator : ‘He who walketh along the road and “repeateth” [the Law] and stoppeth his repetition and saith, “How fair is that tree” —to him the Scripture accounteth that as sin, depriving him of the right to life’ (Mishna : Pirke Aboth, ch. iii.).

The ancient Greek was more fortunate ; for him this depressing turning aside from the straight road was not necessary ; he felt and saw god in the road itself, in the yellowing meadow, in the fragrant grove, in the ripening grace of the garden. He surrounded himself and his human life with a whole swarm of deities of nature, now kindly, now threatening, but always sympathetic. And what is most important, he succeeded in establishing a spiritual union with those deities, in looking at their life through the prism of his own consciousness, and in infusing them with a living understanding of himself. To him the Nostradamus of Faust would not address these words of reproach :

Diff. 186/185
187 186/185/187

The spirit-world no closures fasten ;
Thy sense is shut, thy heart is dead.

[Tr. TAYLOR.]

After the fall of the ancient world even this gladdening consciousness vanished from the souls of men, yet not without a trace : the ancient Christian religions preserved the germs of it, which in the best representatives of those religions even produced very beautiful fruit, as for example in St. Francis of Assisi, when from beneath the accretions of Judaism there was revealed to him the true, antique foundation of Christianity. . . . But let us return to the Greek.

Out of the earth, from a crevice in the rocks, gushes a cool spring, creating green life around it and quenching the thirst of the flocks and of their shepherd : this is a goddess, a nymph, a naiad. Let us thank her for her good will by good will, let us shelter her current with a roof, let us hollow out a basin beneath her, in order that in its gleaming surface she may contemplate her divine form. On appointed days let us not forget to cast her a wreath of field flowers, and to redden her bright waters with the blood of a lamb slain in her honour. On the other hand, if we come to her in time of doubt and anguish of spirit and incline our ears to her murmur, she will remember us and will whisper to us salutary counsel or a word of comfort. And if the place whence she draws her bright waters is suited to human habitation, a city may arise there, and a whole people will worship her, all Hellas will glorify her. Such is Callirrhoë in Athens, Dirce in Thebes, Pirene in Corinth. Each morning the girls of the city will gather at the naiad's sanctuary, in order to fill their jars with her water and to delight her kindly ears with girlish prattle, and in her purifying waters the inhabitants of the city will bathe their new-born children.

A stream flows, unites with another stream, and forms a river; here the concept of good will gives way to another concept—of strength. To be sure, Greece has no great rivers; the most important of them cannot be compared even to the Cam of England or the Charles of Massachusetts. And yet in flood-time even they can cause no little devastation, casting themselves on the cultivated fields and breaking down trees in their way with the violent rush of an enraged bull. Therefore they are represented in the form of bulls or half-bulls. Their wrath, however, is a rare phenomenon, called forth ordinarily by the sins of the inhabitants, who have passed false judgment in the market-place and driven forth Justice from their assemblies; at other times they are beneficent deities, fructifying with their moisture not only the neighbouring meadows and forests, but, thanks to irrigation ditches, the whole plain; in Greece with its scanty rainfall they are veritable 'nourishers' of their land. In return they also enjoy worship. At appropriate places men build temples to them and make offerings; they invoke them in public prayers, and absolutely all boys, when they reach the age of ephebi (that is, puberty), consecrate to them the first lock of their hair that is cut off. Such are the river Cephissus for Athens, Ismenus for Thebes, Inachus for Argos. Being the nourishers of the whole land, they have also a mysterious influence on the human harvest—childless parents turn to them with a prayer for offspring. And if among the multitude of Greek proper names we find such as Cephisodotus, Ismenias, or Anaximander (that is, probably, -meander) it is a superfluous question to ask where those who bear them were born. But a river-god was not merely the nourisher of the inhabitants of his country in times of peace; in times of war he was their support, and not only in a physical but in a religious sense. The Erasinus is a very tiny little river, a mere streamlet, and yet the Spartan general Cleomenes on his expedition to Argos did not venture to pass over it, as the river-god, after many sacrifices, did not give him permission to do so.

The grove also is alive in its deity—and not only as a whole, but in the person of the separate trees. Here too we have nymphs, nymphs of the trees, dryads. There are many of them—and hence comes their happiness: on moonlight nights they come forth from the trees and join in choral dance, led by their queen, Artemis, goddess of the groves. Yet even a solitary tree is divine, if it be strong and beautiful—like that plane tree on the bank of the Ilissus in Athens, under which Socrates and Phaedrus once rested.

There is the lofty and spreading plane tree, and the agnus castus high and clustering, in the fullest blossom and the greatest fragrance; and the stream which flows beneath the plane tree is deliciously cold to the feet. Judging from the ornaments and images, this must be a spot sacred to Acheloüs and the nymphs.

[PLATO, Phaedrus, 230 B: tr. JOWETT.]

For good will one must pay with good will, as we have already seen: and is not this a proof of good will—the cool shade in the heat of the day, the quiet murmur of the rustling leaves, the song, if not always of birds, of the grasshoppers dear to the Grecian heart? In all this one feels love; and where love is, there is God likewise.

But the nymphs know another love as well.

For the grove and the forest are an eternal, incessant fructifying and creating of the physical life by which nature lives. For the Greek his nymph is unceasing fertility, an unceasing love-play with the wanton representatives of the fructifying element of the forest, the satyrs—and sometimes also with that god who at home in Arcadia was the supreme god of creation and fructifying, but who became for the rest of Greece the wanderer god, the kindly and careless Hermes. All this does not concern mortals—and yet there are exceptions. It sometimes happens that even a mortal, thanks to his beauty, becomes worthy of the caresses of a divine nymph; such is the story, for example, of a certain beautiful shepherd, Daphnis. The love of the goddess brought him no good fortune; he ventured to betray her for a mortal woman, and therefore, blind man, he was punished with physical blindness. And whenever in a grove, in a clearing, there was found an infant of marvellous beauty and strength, foolish folk vexed themselves with guesses and gossip, but experienced old women knew that it was the child of a nymph.

And aloft, ever higher—on Hymettus and Pentelicon—here forests and trees no longer occur, here only goats go from time to time to nibble the prickly herbage that peeps forth from between white blocks of limestone. Here more and more frequently one may see naked masses of rock, full of fantastic pinnacles and grottos. This is the kingdom of the oreads, nymphs who dwell in the mountain wastes. Here in the grottos they weave thin, invisible fabrics, sweetening their labours with song ; no mortal ever ventures to hearken to them or to watch them, but their looms may be seen by day, if one enter the grotto—of course after repeating an appropriate prayer. They are pleased also with other tokens of reverence—if one anoint with oil the rocky pinnacle or hang on it a girdle, or make a modest offering on the altar at the entrance to the grotto. And they will pay their debt : who but they guards the precious spring that gushes forth at the summit ? Who but they saves our she-goat from going astray amid the crags ?

But no : here they have a rival. He is a guest from Arcadia, of comparatively recent adoption into the assembly of the gods of Greece as a whole, the fantastic guardian spirit of goats, Pan the goat-legged. If we call him a ' god ', it is simply because we designate by that name any powerful, immortal being of whatever sort ; in reality we understand perfectly the difference between him and the great gods of Olympus. Later the evil conscience of a religion which has cut loose from nature and Mother Earth will change him into the devil ; but we love him and respect him as the kindly god of the mountains with the melodious pipes. To be sure, we know of many of his strange pranks, not to speak of those of which his neighbours the oreads might tell us. At noonday he takes a nap (that is 'the hour of Pan'), and woe to the incautious shepherd who ventures at that time to amuse himself by playing his pipes! When the awakened Pan thrusts forth his shaggy brow from behind a crag, when he shouts over all the countryside, then the frightened goats will rush downward over the stones, overturning in their path both one another and the terror-stricken shepherd. Never will he forget Pan and his 'panic' fear!

The earth is divine, but the sea is equally so. For the Greeks it has a deeper significance than for any other nation, even among those situated on the sea; for it not only encircles their shores, but lovingly penetrates their land with innumerable bays and straits, refreshing it and furnishing on every hand convenient water communication. And so the Greeks become fused with it; every one of them is a born sailor and mariner. And therefore great is their honour for the god Posidon and his spouse Amphitrite, who dwells deep beneath the blue surface and rules over a multitude of fishes, crabs, and other strange and monstrous denizens of her moist kingdom. Posidon, however, is not only the god of an element, but a revered member of the Olympian family, and we shall speak further of him.

Immediately connected with the sea are the sea-nymphs, or nereids, 'the personification of the gentle waves of the sea', as some men will later speak of them in a dry and stupid fashion. Clearly those men will never attain the grace of beholding the nereids themselves, in their proper form, silver-footed, as they sport about on a serene day, racing with the dolphins, their golden hair flashing over the crests of the waves. Great is that grace, and yet it is nothing in comparison to that which they bestow on their elect, as did Thetis, who made Peleus happy in her love, and, a goddess, bore to him the most beautiful and the most noble hero in the world, Achilles. Of this a common mortal may not dream; he prays to the potent goddesses for a successful voyage, and will not forget to show them due gratitude in the form of a votive gift and a sacrifice.

The nereids are the nymphs of the sea, but they too have their satyrs. These are the tritons, youths with tails like those of fishes. With them it is better not to make acquaintance; they are, as those same wiseacres will say, 'the personification of the stormy waves'. Behold, the clouds have obscured the blue of the sky, the sea has grown ominously black and ruffled—and suddenly in the distance is heard a loud, prolonged roar. . . . It is the tritons blowing on their conch shells; it is the prelude to the coming storm. Then, sailors, furl your sails, labour with your oars—and at the same time pray ardently to Posidon, to the nereids, and to your protectors on the sea, the twin Dioscuri, Castor and Polydeuces. Your prayers will be heard, two feeble flames will gleam at opposite ends of the yard—it is they in person, the divine Dioscuri—they give you an omen of salvation.

The sea also has its Pan ; he is Proteus, the shepherd of a flock of strange beasts of the sea, and himself a very strange creature. As to his form it is difficult to say anything : he changes it continually, like the sea itself, but he is most frequently simply an old man of the sea. His whimsies are well known to his daughter Idothea, a daughter who shows small respect for her father, but who is gracious to sailors. Like her is Leucothea, now also a goddess of the sea, but once the wronged wife Ino. . . . Here and there in Greece Bacchic mysteries are celebrated in her honour, but in Attica she is known mostly from Homer, as the kind deliverer of Odysseus.

And further—whoever has felt the irresistible charm of the sea on a serene day, when the sunbeams play on its surface and the waves lap gently, and it is impossible to restrain one's longing to plunge into that blue expanse—he knows also the sea-god Glaucus (or ' the blue '). And there is yet another, fatal yearning—when after your long struggle the waves have overwhelmed you, when your arms droop, and in your ears rings a melancholy and tempting summons to soothing death. That is the sirens singing on a distant, desolate crag, amid the roaring billows : God grant that none may hear their song !

Finally, the third element, the heavens. It is called Uranus, but that name awakens in us no religious feeling. Theologians say that once the primordial Mother Earth produced from herself Uranus and that he became the element that fructified her and caused her to bear the Titans and the Titanids ; and they add that finally her own posterity began to weigh upon her and that at her request the youngest of the Titans, Cronus, deprived his father of regenerative power—such was the first sin among the denizens of the heavens. These guesses do not bind us ; the undoubted lord of the heavens is Zeus, the son of Cronus (‘ the fulfiller ’). His character is not in the least degree derived from his significance as a god of nature, but for the moment we are speaking only of Zeus ‘ the cloud-gatherer ’, who gathers the storm in the murky sky, of Zeus ‘ the caster of thunderbolts ’, who throws his fiery bolt at the high places of earth, against lofty trees and buildings, at all that is too lofty, as a lesson to mortals. Him above all we must try to appease by prayer and sacrifice. . . . By sacrifice ! But how ? The heavens are not the earth and not the sea ; a hand bearing gifts can never reach them. Verily we should be eternally separated from the king of the ether, had not the friend of mankind, the Titan Prometheus, brought us secretly the heavenly fire. The fire aspires to return to its heavenly habitation, it rises to it in the form of flying smoke—then let it carry with it also the smoke and steam of our sacrifice. A fiery sacrifice is the true tribute to the gods of the heavens.

The denizens of the divine heavens are likewise divine; and above all, of course, its great stars, Helios, the Sun, and Selene, the Moon. As to the nature of Helios there are no universally accepted ideas. Many men still think that he is a divine youth, who traverses in a golden chariot the 'firmament' of heaven, and that the blinding light which we see is really the gleam of his chariot. For us it is a riddle how, vanishing in the west, he rises in the east: of old, men thought that by night he made his return voyage to the east by a river called Oceanus, which encircles the earth, but to-day it is a matter fairly well proved that Helios and the other stars sink beneath the horizon and during our night shine in the lands of the blessed on the surface of the earth opposite our own. Once Anaxagoras taught us that Helios was a gigantic glowing ball, as large as the Peloponnesus. Many men then thought that he exaggerated—just think of it, as the whole Peloponnesus!—and others called him an atheist, because he changed a god into a ball, and a glowing one at that. We will leave to the astronomers of Alexandria all scientific investigations into the forms and motions of the heavenly bodies ; a god remains a god without regard to the garment which it pleases him to wear. And for us Helios is above all a purifying god ; as his blazing beams by the force of their heat make harmless all putrefaction, so his spirit annihilates all stain, every nightmare of anxious slumber. When he rises we hail him with a greeting and a prayer, and we relate to him our disquieting dreams, that he may purify our souls from them.

Selene we worship and love because she illumines our nights with her kindly light ; by her we reckon the days of our lives, always beginning each month at the new moon and ending it at the new moon. Therefore the month is divided into the time of the waxing moon, that of the full moon, and that of the waning moon, approximately ten days apiece. Besides this lovers may entrust Selene with their joyous or their melancholy secrets : the good goddess will not deny them counsel. As to her further powers, one may question the enchantresses, above all those of Thessaly, who by their songs can bring her down from her heavenly paths and force her to serve their charms : that is a domain of sinful practices, justly persecuted in well-ordered states.

The heaven by night is full of marvels. . . . There is ' the evening star ', Hesperus, fairest of stars, ' sharer of the throne of Aphrodite '—why so, lovers know well. There is the group of seven stars, the Pleiades; they are as it were the nymphs of heaven. As 'doves' (peleiades) they bring to Zeus ambrosia; yet at the same time they are comely goddesses, daughters of the Titan Atlas, and spouses of the gods, as was that Maia who on the summit of Cyllene bore Hermes to Zeus. There is the (Great) Bear: such was the form which Zeus gave to his chosen one, the nymph Callisto, whom previously the jealous Hera had changed into a wild beast of the same name. The queen of heaven was not pleased at the honour bestowed upon her rival, and therefore she prevailed upon Oceanus, the god of the river which encircles the earth, not to permit her to enjoy a refreshing bath in his bright waters. There is Arcturus or Boötes: he was placed there to guard the Bear (Arcturus, 'the guard of the bear'; Boötes, 'the cowherd'). There is Orion, the passionate 'lover', who dared to raise his hand against Artemis. Many, very many such tales are in circulation about the meaning of the mysterious figures in which the stars of the sky are arranged; but all this is 'poetical religion', rather a play of the imagination than a matter of faith. The only exception is the 'Heavenly Twins', the Dioscuri, Castor and Polydeuces. When after a storm at sea the clouds are parted, and on a patch of night sky shines forth the kindly light of these twin stars, then the sailor in ardent gratitude raises towards them his palms : the appearance of those deities who have always protected him is bringing him salvation.

When we speak of heavenly phenomena, we must not omit the winds : they too are divine. They are distinguished by the direction from which they blow and are appropriately characterized. The wind 'from beyond the mountains', Boreas, brings cold, but it disperses the clouds ; in Attica it enjoyed special honour, since it blew from Thrace, a country on which the Athenian state had special views, of a political nature. Its opponent, Notus, blows from the parched deserts of Africa, and, flying over the sea, gathers up its moisture, which it later allows to fall in the form of rain. The west wind, Zephyrus, in Greece was not necessarily regarded as a spring wind, as it was by the Romans ; it is rather a strong, violent wind, like its opponent, Eurus.

If the reader has grown weary of contemplating the separate parts of this divine nature, let him now gather together his impressions, let him concentrate his feeling of worship and adoration on the two great, dominating elements, Father Zeus and Mother Earth. In them is inherent the primary, fundamental dualism of Greek religion. One is the fructifying force, the other the fructified ; their mutual attraction is that primordial, holy love, that Eros which has created all the life of the living world, and which is also the type and the justification of human love.

Lovingly the Heaven yearns to fructify the Earth.

[Compare AESCHYLUS, frag. 44.]

Thus does Aphrodite defend the human love of Hypermnestra and Lynceus, for the sake of which Hypermnestra has violated the stern command of her father. Thus the heaven fructifies the earth with its warmth, its light, its rain; it is the eternally male and the earth is the eternally female element. The Greek language expresses this religion with absolute clearness: in it ouranos is of masculine gender, gaia of feminine. Latin, in which coelum is of neuter gender, and Slavic, in which nebo is also of neuter gender, are far less clear; but on the other hand the words for earth in all the Indo-European languages are of feminine gender. And if anything can prove how inaccessible to our own feeling is the Egyptian religion, it is the fact that in it the earth is a god, and the sky a goddess.

Yet why does Aeschylus term the Heavens (Uranus) and not Zeus, the universal fructifier? He might with equal confidence have mentioned the latter; Indian, Latin, and Germanic analogies prove that the original meaning of the name Zeus was 'heavens' or 'sky'. Once on a time the dualism of Zeus and Earth had been of great importance in Greek religion; the oldest and most beautiful myths are founded on it, and furthermore the famous confession of faith of the Sibyl of Dodona recognizes it :

Zeus was, Zeus is, and Zeus shall be. O mighty Zeus !
Earth yieldeth fruits ; therefore ye name her Mother
Earth. [Tr. LINFORTH.]

But as in a man's immediate feeling the mother who bore him and nourished him is physically nearer than the mediate causer of his birth, the father, so of the two cosmic parents of all life the father at an earlier date took on a spiritual nature, while only Mother Earth remained in immediate proximity to human consciousness.

She is the oldest of the assembly of the Olympian gods : Greece built many temples to her, under the simple name of Mother (Mētēr)—as in Athens and Olympia—long before there was introduced from Asia Minor the cult of a kindred but barbaric goddess, the Great Mother of the gods, or Cybele. She was represented as a stately woman, of maternal form, with only the upper half of her body emerging from her native element.

The Greek cherished truly filial feelings for this parent and nourisher—both love and worship—to a degree absolutely incomprehensible to the denatured consciousness of our contemporaries. To be sure, we too are capable of going to war for our fatherland ; but what is this ' physical patriotism ' in comparison with that which filled the Greek with ardour at the thought of his Mother Earth, with that which found expression in the marvellous verses of Aeschylus :

You meanwhile

It now behoves—both him who faileth yet
Of youth's fair prime, and him whose bloom is past,
His body's vigour nursing to the full,
And each with vigour that befits him best—
The State to aid and shrines of native gods,
That ne'er their honours be erased ; to aid
Your children too, and this your Mother Earth, Beloved nurse, who, while your childish limbs
Crept on her friendly plain, all nurture-toil
Full kindly entertained, and fostered you
Her denizens to be, in strait like this Shield-bearing champions, trusty in her cause.

[AESCHYLUS, The Seven against Thebes, 10-20 :
tr. SWANWICK.]

Agricultural reforms are now the question of the day, and the motto ' the land for the people ' is regarded as the last word in democracy. To the Greek it would have seemed blasphemy : no, not the land for the people, but the people for the land ! The needs of the land should be in the foreground. It is of them that Solon thought, when he carried through the first agricultural reform known to history ; it was her favour that he wished to gain for himself :

Turning now to my own case, and considering first the objects for which I brought the people together, you ask me why I stopped before I had achieved those objects. The answer to this question may be found in the corroborative evidence which will be given before the tribunal of Time by the black Earth, the supreme mother of the divinities of Olympus. I removed the stones of her bondage which had been planted everywhere, and she who was a slave before is now free.

[Quoted by ARISTOTLE, Constitution of Athens, 12 :
tr. LINFORTH.]

This is true, far-seeing democracy. The earth is more than the people, for it is the source of the life of all the descendants of people now living. To the Greek this profoundly true and beneficent dogma was disclosed by his immediate religious feeling.

In view of this can we marvel at the pride felt by the Athenians at the thought that they were 'autochthones', that is, that their forefathers were in a literal sense born from the land which they themselves still inhabited? We find this thought in every encomium on Athens, whether in verse or in prose, so that we see clearly how precious it was to the inhabitants of the city of Pallas. And it is no accident that from Athens came the thinker who dressed this thought in the form of a philosophic doctrine—extending it, to be sure, to all humanity—Epicurus. Mother Earth, he maintains, has now ceased to give birth; she no longer brings into the world either men or other living creatures, except for some low species—and we men of to-day may be indulgent to this result of diligent but inadequate observation. But in the time of her fruitful youth, Epicurus continues, it was otherwise; then she brought forth the first men immediately from her womb. And immediately after this act there occurred within her the same phenomenon as in the body of a woman who has given birth: an excess of fluids was transformed into milk, and all over her surface elevations grew up from which gushed forth vivifying streams for the new-born children.

[De Rerum Natura, v, 821, 822.]

Quare etiam atque etiam maternum nomen adepta
Terra tenet merito—

Wherefore, again and again I say, the earth with good title has gotten and keeps the name of mother (since she of herself gave birth to mankind).

[Tr. MUNRO.]

Such is the conclusion of the ardent disciple of Epicurus, Lucretius.

And one can also understand that under the watchful care of this mother, and surrounded by her devoted children, the Greek never felt himself alone; he never knew that feeling of desertion which a man in our day so often experiences as a just punishment for his ingratitude and impiety. I will cite one example of many. I will remind you of the fate of Philoctetes. Deserted by his comrades on the desolate island of Lemnos, lame and with the eternal pain of a wound on his leg that refused to heal, it would seem that no man could be more unfortunate. Despite this, I beg you to observe in what manner, after ten years' torture in this wilderness, he bids it farewell—yet the reader, trained in modern aesthetics, must not seek to show his own cleverness ; he must not seek for poetic adornments and licences, but must take every word simply, in its literal meaning.

Yet ere I part I fain would bid farewell.
 Home of my vigils, rocky cell,
 Nymphs of the streams and grass-fringed shore,
 Caves where the deep-voic'd breakers roar,
 When through the cavern's open mouth,
 Borne on the wings of the wild South,
 E'en to my dwelling's inmost lair,
 The rain and spray oft drench'd my hair ;
 And oft responsive to my groan
 Mount Hermaeum made his moan ;
 O Lycian fount, O limpid well,
 I thought with you all time to dwell ;
 And now I take my last farewell.
 Sea-girt Lemnos, hear my prayer !
 Bid thy guest a voyage fair,
 Speed him to the land where he,
 Borne by mighty Destiny,
 And the god at whose decree
 All was ordered, fain would be.

[SOPHOCLES, Philoctetes, 1452-68 : tr. STORR.]

But this feeling of orphanhood was only one punishment of the Mother for her recreant sons ; another punishment was still more terrible.

Ancient Israel was the direct opposite of Hellas. Led by its God, the Lord of Hosts, it entered into ' the promised land ' as a stranger and a conqueror. It cherished no filial feelings for that land, which had never been its mother, but had been populated by evil spirits. And it grafted its own predatory, mandatory relation to the land upon those religions which in some degree arose from it, upon Christianity and Islam. The earth was transformed from a mother into a slave, obedient, but vengeful. To be sure, Christianity has never ventured to become the scourge of the earth—its other foundation, that of Greek and Roman life, was too powerful within it. But truly terrible was the devastation which Islam brought with it. I pray you, look into ancient sources and convince yourself what flourishing lands during the epoch of Greco-Roman culture were Asia Minor, 'the land of five hundred cities', Syria, and northern Africa—and then call to mind what they are to-day. Verily, the God of Mohammed has devastated with fire that gigantic tract of land; the gods of the ancient world had watched over it with affectionate care.

III

THE CONSECRATION OF WORK

SOME one once ventured to assert that the ancient Greeks despised and scorned physical work, and ever since that time this absurd statement has been wandering unchecked through the pages of manuals and compendiums that derive their material at second hand or at tenth hand. Of course, this allegation must have had some basis. It was founded on the opinion of the aristocratic writer Plato and of a few others concerning the injurious effect on man's mental processes of artisan labour, which chains him to the workshop and at the same time directs his thoughts exclusively towards gain. But, to say nothing of the fact that Plato and his fellow-writers are not speaking of all physical labour, and in particular not of labour in the fields, what warrant have we to make Plato's words representative of the view of Greece as a whole? Why not oppose to them the Homeric Odysseus, who appeals with equal pride to his endurance at the time of harvest and to his deeds in war?—Odysseus, who with his own hands made himself his marriage bed and the boat that saved him ! Why should we not mention Hesiod, who dedicated to his heedless brother Perses his Works and Days, with their guiding thought, ' To work, foolish Perses ', and with the famous verse :

Now work is no disgrace, sloth is disgrace (verse 311).

Mother Earth, who bestowed upon her beloved Hellas so many precious gifts, did not bless her with fertility of soil : the Greek people had to gain their scanty sustenance by labour, of which the inhabitants of kindly plains can have no conception. Stone terraces had to be built on the slopes of the mountains, in order to prevent the winter rains from washing away a fertile layer which no one who has ever visited those regions will call ' black loam ' ; reservoirs had to be dug in the stony ground at appropriate places, in order to preserve the precious rain water for the rainless months ; rivers had to be diverted into irrigation ditches in order to secure for the fields their needful portion of moisture—the Cephissus of Athens did not even reach the sea, being entirely absorbed by ditches. And all this was only the beginning of the work that the Greeks had to undertake !

As we see from this—but, of course, not from this alone—the labour of man rather seriously disturbed the calm of the divine life of the Mother and of the children whom she bore : how then do they react to this intrusion ? A compact was needed, which should define the rights and the duties of man ; a divine service was needed, in exchange for the service which the divinity had agreed to render to man : in other words, a need was felt for the consecration of work by religion. This was secured, and moreover, to a greater degree than by any other nation. If the abundant phenomena, partially set forth in the preceding chapter, permit us to regard ancient religion as a religion of nature, so those to which we are now passing will give us a perfect right to see in it a religion of work. But, as I must emphasize at the outset, not merely of work, but—of the joy of work.

Man in the hunting stage of social development disturbed least the normal course of the life of nature ; for at bottom man the hunter differs but little from the lion, the wolf, the vulture, and other predatory creatures whose life forms a single whole with the life of the rest of nature. He differs but little, and yet he differs : through reason, through an ingenuity which rises above nature, and which has led him to invent nets, arrows, and spears, to tame dogs, and to devise a whole hunting equipment that threatens with extinction the living creatures of the forests and mountains.

So man must receive the laws that guide his activity from the goddess whom he serves as a hunter—from Artemis. She is the mighty guardian of all manner of beasts and birds ; equally dear to her heart are the young of all living creatures, even though they be the young of beasts and birds of prey. She permits man to make free use of adult individuals, but she does not permit him to destroy the species—and an Erinyes punishes him if disobedient. Thus the nests of birds are sacred, and pregnant females are sacred; if one of them falls into the hands of a hunter, his duty is 'to let it go free for Artemis'.

This humane relation to animals, which so favourably distinguished the ancient Greeks from their descendants of to-day, and which found expression for example in the beautiful saying, 'Even dogs have their Erinyes', was to a notable degree called forth by the fact that the Greeks felt upon them the gaze of Artemis, who heard the cries of tortured creatures and condemned the offender to punishment at the hands of the dread goddesses of the underworld, the guardians of the great compact by which the world lives. And in the epoch of agricultural life this right of beasts to kind treatment was confirmed anew in the most holy of Greek mysteries, those of Eleusis: one of the commandments of Triptolemus ran, 'Do no wrong to beasts'.

As we see, these beneficent precepts, which in modern states have been developed by the civil law in comparatively recent times (and which are observed with a conscientiousness with which we are all familiar!) were enjoined on the Greek by his religion, as the immediate consequence of his filial relation to Mother Earth.

And it is self-evident that for the happy issue of a hunt a man also owed gratitude to Artemis. In general, whoever would gain a due conception of the pure beauty of the relations of a hunter to this goddess, who was his guardian, should make the acquaintance of the young hunter Hippolytus in Euripides' tragedy of that name. Yet man must not think that when he has emerged from the hunting stage of social development into another he may forget the virgin goddess of the forests. Thus sinned Oeneus of Calydon: gathering an abundant harvest from the fields, he honoured with the first fruits the other gods, but he neglected Artemis. The goddess reminded him of her existence by sending against his growing crops a monstrous boar and thereby calling forth the tragedy of the 'Calydonian hunt', in which she played the same part as Aphrodite in the tragedy of the Trojan War.

And yet the shedding of blood in hunting, even though sanctified by law, troubled the sensitive conscience of the Greek. He felt the need of subjecting himself on his return home to a religious purification; and not he himself alone must be purified but even his hunting dogs:

For Zeus himself ordained this law for men:
The forest beasts, and fish, and winged birds

May without sin on one another feed,
For to them Justice is unknown ; to man
However he gave Justice.

[HESIOD, Works and Days, 276-279.]

On passing from the hunting stage of society to the pastoral, man felt the need of similarly consecrating to the gods this branch of his work, of giving to it also the forms of divine service. Obviously he must pay his first debt of gratitude to that god who had permitted humanity, guided by himself, to attain that higher stage of culture. This was Hermes, the god of Arcadia, of a land which, remaining predominantly pastoral even in historic times, preserved better than other regions the traditions of the pastoral epoch. He it was who brought down from Olympus the first herd of cows and gave them to mortals : this gift had at first a deep meaning, similar to that of the rape of fire by Prometheus, and only the ill repute into which the Arcadians fell in historic times, as vagabonds and thieves, permitted singers to transform even this beneficent act of their god into a clever thievish trick—for ‘many things do bards devise’ in which even they themselves do not believe. In some other places shepherds worshipped Apollo : once on a time he himself, in order to expiate the slaying of the Python (or the Cyclops) had deigned for a whole year to be the shepherd of Admetus, King of Thessaly—both the flocks and their owner prospered well with such a shepherd. With Pan we are already acquainted; he too came from Arcadia, where he was regarded as the son of Hermes. And the inevitable assistants of all these gods were 'the nymphs of the waters and the meadows', who afforded moisture to the pastures in the burning days of summer; to them also the shepherds built unpretentious shrines, and they worshipped them with prayers, gifts, and sacrifices.

They also worshipped them—and along with them other pastoral gods—with the music of the lyre or the pipes, and with songs. The lyre was invented by Hermes, who once happened to find the dry shell of a tortoise, a splendid sounding-board for strings, as he at once observed. He used his lyre to pay for the herd of Apollo, which he had stolen, and thereafter Apollo employed it along with the cithara, which after all was only a perfected lyre. The pipes—in Greek syrinx—were, as we already know, the instrument of Pan. The pastoral life with its abundant leisure furnished opportunity for playing on musical instruments; this playing gave joy to the soul of the player and at the same time was useful to the flocks, which, while listening to the familiar sounds, were in no danger of straying away. From it there developed a special branch of work—that is to say, of intellectual work—and therefore we shall speak of it later.

The care of herds and its kindred occupation, bee-keeping, gave man a natural, bloodless nourishment—both for himself and for his gods : milk, honey, and, in the third place, water—such was the composition of the oldest ‘nephalian’ (that is, sober, without wine) liquid sacrifice. But man could not remain long in ignorance that goats, sheep, and, above all, cows could also feed him with their nutritious and delicious meat. Not without trembling did he profit by this discovery ; in order to do so he was forced to slay his fosterer, to shed her blood. An echo of this terror was still preserved in historic times in the ceremonies of the festival termed the Bouphonia (that is, ‘the bull-slaying’, evidently ‘murder’ and not ‘slaughter’). The bull was led to the altar of Zeus, on which lay an offering of plants dedicated to the god. When the foolish beast began to feed, the attendant priest slew it with a blow of an axe and straightway took to flight ; in his absence judgment was passed on the axe ; special parts of the bull were used for a sacrifice to Zeus, while men consumed the remainder. In historical times men of education laughed not a little at this savage rite and its naïve craft ; but it will be more just on our part to appreciate the delicacy of feeling which here found expression in the idea beneath the rite, that one cannot without sin shed the blood of a domesticated animal.

Finally comes the ordered state of social development, that of agriculture. This brings with it the existence of property, which requires defence ; it gives rise to a fixed abode and a state order ; man's work receives its highest consecration in the service of the god by the entire state. A cycle of public festivals was established in Athens and other Greek cities, on the basis of a compact with Delphi, in whose hands rested the supreme guidance of Hellas in religious matters : hence the dominating part played in these festivals by Apollo and Artemis, in whose honour most of the months were named. Yet at the same time these festivals are the apotheosis of work, and in so lofty, so solemn, so beautiful a form as no other nation of the world has ever known. I am forced to limit myself to a brief characterization of them, and therefore shall not depart from the confines of Athens.

The goddess of field work is Demeter, really one of the variants of Mother Earth, as we may judge with certainty from her name (Dē-mētēr—'soil-mother'). For the Greek she was the symbol of the ripening grain, in the waves of which we may perceive her even to-day. And therefore this 'mother' has a 'daughter', Cora, the symbol of the kernels from which the grain for the next year will spring forth. How from this mystery of the reviving grain Hellenic wisdom deduced the further mystery of the immortality of the soul we shall discuss later ; on this amazing synthesis rests the most holy of the solemnities of Demeter, the Eleusinian festival and its mysteries ; but originally this was only the festival of tillage (proërosia). Solemn likewise was the day on which the stay of Cora with her lord in the underworld was half concluded, but still more solemn was the festival of the harvest itself. And here the thought of the Greek, of the Athenian, did not remain fixed on the mere physical significance of the action : the giver of crops appeared to him as the foundress of all settled life, which is characterized by the stability of the marriage bond and by family life ; he beheld in her his 'lawgiver' (thesmophoros), and transformed the original harvest festival into a deeply pondered festival of family life in general, the Thesmophoria, which was celebrated exclusively by married women. Schiller has most beautifully depicted the significance of these rites in his Festival of Eleusis, but under an incorrect title ; he has in mind Demeter Thesmophoros, not the Demeter of Eleusis.

After field work comes the work of the cultivation of the vine, which was immensely important in southern lands, and which was consecrated to Dionysus. The development of Dionysus in Greece was quite the reverse of that of Demeter. She was transformed from the modest goddess of the ripening cornfields into a lawgiver goddess and a goddess of the mysteries of the world beyond the grave. He made his appearance in Greece as the god of creative ecstasy, who also brought to his initiates tidings of the immortality of the soul ; yet in the public cult his festival also had to be adapted to human labour : therefore he was entrusted with the cultivation of the vine, akin to the ecstasy that he bestowed, but originally independent of him. At present we will confine ourselves to this side of his nature.

The anxiety that Dionysus might bless the growing, flowering, and fruit-giving vine pertained only to the private cult of the deity ; the state cared for the vine only after the grapes were gathered. The cycle of the festivals of Dionysus opened with the gay Oschophoria, or 'bearing of the grapes'. They were borne by ephebi, chosen youths of the ten phylae (tribes), from the temple of Dionysus in Athens to the temple of Pallas in Phalerum ; the clusters of grapes were the gift of Dionysus to the goddess-guardian of the land. The other festivals were connected with various stages of the fermentation of the young wine : they were the Rural Dionysia in December, the Lenaea in January, and the Anthesteria in February. All were accompanied by ceremonies, partly gay and partly serious, and were coloured by a multitude of marvellous myths and legends ; but the most beautiful of all the Dionysiac festivals was the Great Dionysia in March, established by Pisistratus. Its founder appreciated the original significance of the god to whom worship was paid ; for him Dionysus was the god of creative ecstasy : wine became subordinate ; song dominated, and within its sphere the song of songs, tragedy. Whoever prizes the culture of the human race must bow his head reverently before the Great Dionysia ; that festival furnished the occasion for the rise of those mighty creations of human genius, the works of Aeschylus, Sophocles, and Euripides.

Of the remaining branches of field labour, the culture of trees in general was also consecrated to Dionysus as ' dendrites ', the god of the gathering forces of spring ; but the Athenian consecrated his olive to his goddess-guardian, Pallas Athena. For it was she who had presented her people with it on that memorable day when the fate of the city was decided. Posidon, wishing to show the people his strength, with a stroke of his trident drew forth a spring of sea water from the rock of the Acropolis ; but Pallas showed men that goodness rather than strength is the highest manifestation of divinity : at her nod there grew forth on that same rock her immortal olive, the venerable progenitor of the time-honoured olive trees in the valley of the Cephissus. They too are venerable : they are called ' moriae ', or ' trees of fate ', for fate punishes any person who touches such a tree with a sacrilegious hand :

Youth shall not mar it by the ravage of his hand, nor any who dwells with old age ; for the sleepless eye of the Morian Zeus beholds it, and the gray-eyed Athena.

[SOPHOCLES, Oedipus at Colonus, 702-706 :
tr. JEBB.]

The Spartans respected this prohibition during the Peloponnesian War ; as pious men, they did not touch the sacred moriae of Pallas. In those times men still understood the meaning of piety. Apart from this matter, however, in Athens the cult of Pallas as the goddess-guardian of the entire state naturally obscured her cult as the guardian of the olive tree : at her magnificent festival, the Panathenaea, the oil of the olive merely served as a reward for the victors in the games, to whom the state presented it in beautiful clay amphorae, likewise of Athenian workmanship, with symbolic decorations and with the inscription, ' I come from the Athenian games '—as an eternal memorial and one worthy of envy.

To Pallas was likewise consecrated the work of the artisan in all its many branches—for she had the title of Athena Ergane, and as such she had her own holy place on the Acropolis, in front of the Parthenon, and her yearly festival in October, at the new moon. But of all the crafts one was peculiarly near to her, as a goddess : this was the art of weaving, the most distinguished of all branches of women's work from the point of view of artistic perfection. So at the annual festival of the Panathenaea there was deposited on the Acropolis, as a gift to Pallas, a peplos woven by the most skilled women in Athens, and the bearing of it to her shrine formed the central point of all the solemnities.

Of the other crafts Pallas had under her personal protection that of the potter, the pride of all Attica :

Hear thou our prayer, O Athena, protect thou our kiln with thy right hand !

Grant thou success to our pitchers, our pots, and our dishes of clay ;

Grant that they prosper in baking and bring us in plenty of money !—

thus runs a potter's prayer to her which chance has preserved to us. As protectress of this craft, she could easily hold in check the malicious little demons of whose destructive acts we learn from the curse that follows the prayer :

Forward now, Fragments and Cracker ; be watchful, thou demon, Unquenchable !

Hey now, Smashpot and Bully, now may you wreck this man's workshop ;

Ruin the hearth and the house, and overturn all bottom upward,

Breaking the kiln and its contents, mid wailing and groans from the potter !

[Homeric Epigram 14.]

Little demons of like sort presumably infested other crafts as well, but by chance we know nothing of them.

In the work of the smith, however, Pallas had a companion : that man was regarded as a skilful smith who had been taught his craft by 'Hephaestus and Pallas Athena'. Hephaestus, as the god of fire ('the volcanic'), was here indispensable. Athens regarded him with special respect; it built him a beautiful temple—probably that which is still preserved and is usually called the 'Theseum'—and worshipped him along with Pallas at a yearly festival (the 'Hephaesteia' and 'Chalceia', or 'festival of the smiths') at the end of October, before the coming on of winter, when a reminder of the beneficent force of fire was peculiarly in order. And then the Greeks had another god of fire in their benefactor Prometheus, who says justly of himself in the tragedy of Aeschylus that bears his name :

All arts of mortals from Prometheus spring.

[Verse 506 : tr. PLUMPTRE.]

But this fact did not lead to any conflict : the Athenians worshipped both deities, and in similar fashion. The central feature in the festivals of both gods of fire was the torch race, in which the Greek fondness for contests of all sorts was beautifully united with the native element of the divinities to whom worship was paid.

Trade was under the guardianship of Hermes, as in a certain sense it still is to-day : the wanderer god, whose famous staff, the caduceus entwined with serpents, afforded security to wanderers on the public roads, naturally also protected the owners of caravans. But from this point the significance of Hermes expanded in two directions. Among the ancients, as in our own time, trade was of two sorts: wholesale import and export trade (emporikē) and local retail trade (kapēlikē); the first enjoyed much respect, the second very little. The fact that Hermes extended his protection even over the second, with its inherent knavery, could not help lowering the significance of the god himself; but he stood forth in all his greatness as the guardian of the first, which was attended by danger to life, and as its guardian not only by land but by sea. Here too Hermes was needed as a protector against pirates; but more frequently the merchant sailor was exposed to danger from the sea itself—and therefore he prayed zealously to all its deities, of whom I have spoken above.

And since, in consequence of the geographical structure of the Greek territory, trade by sea was far more important than trade by land, the work of the merchant was hardly distinguished from the work of the sailor. In Hellas its range was immense; Hesiod's Works and Days is concerned solely with agriculture and seafaring. And similarly in the organization of the Greek festival seafaring is of most importance next to agriculture. Of course the most suitable times for sailors' festivals were the beginning and the end of the season for sea voyages, the days that followed the spring storms and preceded those of autumn. In Athens these festivals were the Delphinia at the beginning of April and the Pyanepsia in October: both were connected with a voyage memorable for the city of Pallas, though it was not the voyage of a merchant; that is to say, with the voyage of Theseus, and with the offering to the Minotaur on the island of Crete of seven youths and seven maidens. With trembling, their fathers and mothers had sent them forth on their way, and with trembling they awaited their return; the ceremonies of the two festivals naturally preserved the memory of those feelings.

To-day Greece has no special season for sea-faring; the steam engine and the compass permit us to disregard storms and cloudy skies. In ancient times it was otherwise. Yet after the November rains there followed calm, serene days, during which Posidon's toilers could return to their work and guide home the ships that had been imprisoned in foreign ports by storms. The Greek religion of nature easily found an explanation for this strange phenomenon. It comes from the fact that at this season the female of the halcyon, a bird sacred to the god of the seas, broods over its eggs in its floating nest: for its sake Posidon with his trident smooths the waves of the sea, that they may not drown the hopes of his favourite. Hence the beautiful Greek story of the 'halcyon days' as days of calm after a storm; hence also the Greek name of December, Posideon.

But let us return to the Delphinia and the Pyanepsia. It may seem strange that these two most important festivals of the seafaring life are consecrated not so much to Posidon or Hermes as to Apollo, a god who might seem to have no connection with trade or with the sea. This is undoubtedly explained by the fact that the whole cycle of festivals, as we have already seen, was established by the Greek communes with the co-operation and the approval of Delphi; the Delphic college of priests naturally secured for its own god a leading place in the whole cycle. This becomes especially plain in the ceremonies of the Pyanepsia. This festival marked something more than the close of the season for sea voyages; occurring as it did at the time when work in the fields came to an end, the Pyanepsia was in general the most important festival of work. And the foremost of its ceremonies impresses us by its peculiar beauty and fulness of meaning. In the solemn procession a handsome boy, both of whose parents were still living (amphithalēs), carried an olive branch hung with fruits, cakes, and little jars of olive oil, honey, and milk, that is to say, with gifts of Demeter, Dionysus, and Pallas: this was the 'eiresiōne'. He carried it to the temple of Apollo, as the god of work and of all the joy of work. The members of the procession meanwhile sang gay songs, two of which have been preserved : one of them runs as follows :

Eiresione brings figs, and eiresione brings loaves ;
Honey it brings in a jar, and oil to rub on our bodies,
And a strong flagon of wine, for all to go mellow to bed on.

[Cited in PLUTARCH, Theseus: tr. adapted from CLOUGH.]

On this same day the eiresione was also deposited in private houses ; and it is plain that in them this ceremony must have originated, being founded on the religion of Demeter rather than on that of Apollo. The eiresione was fastened to the wall of the house, which it was to guard until the next year's harvest : what was later done with it we do not know, but there are reasons for supposing that it was burned, with prayer, on the family hearth.

So far we have been speaking primarily of physical work : it is self-evident, however, that intellectual work was also accorded religious consecration in Greece. At first its main manifestation, and in a sense the sum of it, was poetry ; or, to speak more exactly, since we are on Greek ground, choreia, or the union of poetry, music, and the dance, the threefold germ-cell of arts which later became distinct from one another.

The Athenians prided themselves on the fact that the very purity of their mountain air fitted them for intellectual work, for poetry : there, on lofty slopes, the intellect becomes clear, the spirit soaring ; thence is derived creative inspiration. So the goddesses of this inspiration are the nymphs of the mountains ; ‘ nympholeptic ’ (possessed by nymphs) is a name given to prophets, who have received their gift of divine insight from the daughters of wise Nature herself. The nymphs of the mountains in their physical aspect we call oreads (from oros, a mountain), but as the givers of inspiration to poets they have preserved a more ancient name, akin to the Latin mons, the name of Muses. Attica had its own ‘ mount of the Muses ’ ; here, according to a local tradition, they were even said to have ‘ been born ’, as daughters of Harmonia ; but this tradition was no match for older accounts, consecrated by the names of Homer and Hesiod, according to which the Muses, daughters of Mnemosyne (‘ Memory ’), dwelt either on Olympus (Homer), or on Helicon (Hesiod). Nearer to us, however, is the Athenian mount of the Muses, despite the fact that it later was forced to change its name for the honoured but unsonorous name of Philopappus, who in the second century after Christ adorned it with a monument which is still partially preserved. From it there is a most marvellous view of the Acropolis and the city of Pallas, and it is pleasant, strolling in the cool of the evening over its barren summit, to pray to its forgotten goddesses, who here once on a time gave inspiration to Aeschylus, Sophocles, and Euripides.

The Muses had under their protection all branches of man's intellectual work—amouosos, 'deserted by the Muses', was the term applied to those who were incapable of such work. 'Let it not be my fate to live among the amousoi', was once the prayer of Euripides. The Muses bestowed their protection on man from his first uncertain steps as a child, from the time that he began to learn to read and write: in the school-room there always stood a statue of the Muse; with her scroll or tablets in her hand she stood before the little boy's eyes as a model of the difficult art in which he was receiving instruction. And it is no wonder that he dedicated his first success to her in particular, by learning to decline her holy name before any other: Mousa, Mousēs in Greek grammar, Musa, Musae in Latin, were the examples of the 'first declension'. (And, if one be curious to inquire, that is how grammar became the most chivalrous of the sciences, including feminine nouns in the first declension and reserving masculines for the second.) In the Christian epoch such giving of honour to a pagan goddess evidently came to be regarded as inadmissible. Musa in grammar had to give way to the similar, but indifferent mensa—such is progress!

If the boy, on growing up, dedicated himself to intellectual work, the Muses became his guardians to an even greater degree. With their guardianship of the poets every one is familiar:

during the good old days of the ancient religion they always invoked the Muses before devoting themselves to their art—in modern times the once living name of the Muses has become a mere classical ghost. With them they united other deities of joy: Apollo, Hermes, and Pallas (to this last goddess, whom they identified with their own Minerva, the Romans gave special attention)—but the Muses always occupied the foremost position. And not only in poetry—music received its name from them, and these two arts, together with the dance, received the name of the ‘musical’ arts, in distinction from the plastic arts, which developed from handicrafts. And when Ptolemy Soter in the third century before Christ founded in Alexandria the first academy of which we have record, he with good reason called it the Mouseion, a name which in a more limited sense is still preserved in our ‘museum’.

But one may inquire whether intellectual work also received consecration at the Greek religious solemnities, and if so, then where? It did receive it, I reply; it received it at all of them. It became their adornment, the principal reason why they were not merely an occasion for repose, but were also an educative school for the entire nation. But with this matter I shall deal in my next chapter.

Here in conclusion I should like to draw attention to a certain fact which is immediately connected with the topic that we are now discussing, the consecration of work. I greatly regret that the brevity of the present sketch does not permit me to describe in somewhat more detail the ceremonies of even the most important Greek festivals, and in particular of those of Athens; the reader would then be convinced that thanks to them the Greek religion fully deserves the name of the first and only religion of joy in the history of humanity. This was already clear to one of her wisest sons, Pericles; in his famous funeral oration he thus expresses himself concerning that side of the life of Athens: 'We have not forgotten to provide for our weary spirits many relaxations from toil; we have regular games and sacrifices throughout the year; at home the style of our life is refined; and the delight which we daily feel in all these things helps to banish melancholy' (Thucydides, ii. 38: tr. Jowett).

The details, I repeat, I cannot give here. But from the few data and allusions that he has encountered in this chapter the reader must already have drawn the conclusion that the Greek festivals or holidays had nothing in common with what we usually associate with the idea of a holiday, that is, with inactivity. In general accord with the positive character of his ethics, the Greek was organically incapable of seeing any merit in inactivity; for him, on the contrary, a holiday was a day of intense work, yet not of work for gain, but for the glory of the gods and for the exaltation of his own soul. On the day when the people were worshipping their goddess Pallas on the Acropolis, or witnessing a tragedy of Sophocles in the theatre of Dionysus, there was obviously no room for everyday work; of necessity the merchant closed his shop because he had no hope of attracting a purchaser to it, and general indignation would have descended on an archon who had ventured to call together a jury to consider a case in court. But this interruption of daily work was only the consequence of the holiday, not its sense and inner content. And if the Greeks of their flourishing epoch had heard that there existed or ever would exist a people who beheld in work as such an offence to the holiday and to the worship of their god, an offence which even deserved to be 'rooted out'—they would have come to the conclusion that that people had extremely strange notions of piety.

Obviously a time came even for them when they renounced this conviction: were they the better for it? The question requires no answer; the most hasty comparison of even the mere external appearance of ancient Greece and of Byzantine Greece will answer it most eloquently.

IV

THE REVELATION OF GOD IN BEAUTY

EACH deity dwells in its proper element and spiritualizes it: such was probably the oldest conception of the Greeks as of other nations. I will call it animatism, thus somewhat modifying, in order to make it more fruitful, the meaning of this term, which was introduced by the anthropologist Marett. At first the deity was merged with its element, not possessing a form independent of it; this was the period of immanent animatism. But gradually the concentration of thought and feeling on the deity itself, as the soul of the element, led to its being physically distinguished from the element: a dryad might remain in her tree, but she might also leave it, though she remained near at hand as its dryad. The period of transcendent animatism began. Then for distinction the deity required its own form, separate from the form of the element: of what sort then was that form to be?

This is a decisive, a fatal question.

The passage to transcendent animatism is not peculiar to the Greek religion, it is a usual phenomenon; the answer to the question of form is characteristic of each religion. It is evident that a form of any sort can be no more than a symbol, for the gods are essentially invisible and reveal themselves only to whom they wish and when they wish. How then shall the invisible be expressed in visible form? How and in what does the god reveal himself? In strength, some reply; in a mysteriousness full of meaning, others reply; in appalling hideousness, still others reply. Thus the Hindu represents his god with many arms; the Egyptian gives to his god the head of a jackal, an ibis, or the like; the imagination of a savage pictures his god with a distorted visage and with protruding tusks. Only the Greek replied: 'God reveals himself in beauty.'

After all, he could make absolutely no other reply: nowhere in the world is there a land so beautiful as Hellas. If even to-day it enchants its still infrequent guests—to-day, when its inhabitants, after depriving nature of divinity, have stripped from her her green garment of forests and have dried up the silver streams of the rivers—then in what form must we imagine it in the happy times of peace and of love between Mother Earth and men her children? No, the deities which gave life to this nature could not help being beautiful themselves; it sufficed to be conscious of her beauty in order to have the single appropriate answer arise of its own accord.

But for this, obviously, time was required; even the Greeks conducted their deity through imperfect stages of strength, horror, and suggestiveness, before they found truly divine relief in beauty. And since an image formed in dusky ages may be preserved, thanks to a feeling of piety, up to the latest times—for the brutal tendency to iconoclasm was organically foreign to the Greek—therefore even in the historic epoch one might encounter a four-armed Apollo in Laconia, a Demeter with a horse's head in Arcadia, and in particular—horribly hideous Erinyes and Gorgons. But these were merely scattered phenomena. Men were disturbed by these traits least in the Erinyes, the Gorgons, and the like ; that is, in personifications of dark, malicious forces ; Aeschylus was still content with them. But towards the end of the fifth century the general tendency towards beauty overcame the survival, which might have seemed fully justified. No, a higher force cannot be hideous. It may be terrible, if need be ; but cannot beauty be terrible ? And so the later types of the Erinyes and Gorgons were created, pale, grim—and beautiful ; the blood runs cold in our veins at the glance of this Medusa (the ' Medusa Rondanini ')—and yet we feel that we have before us an unearthly beauty. Only one god remained, by exception, in his beastlike ugliness, withstanding the victorious assault of the new beauty ; though others might be transformed, Pan could not be separated from his goatish form. But he remained isolated among the fair Grecian Olympians. The Greeks themselves showed a good-natured toleration of the fact ; but when Christian times came the goat-legged god passed for ever into the new plastic mythology under the name of the devil.

But let us not make too great haste. Even then, when the thought of the Greeks had found the single divine answer to the question of the external form of the god, they were still far from giving it perfect expression : the chisel and the brush could not keep pace with creative thought ; the bonds that restrained them were too powerful. Even in that primitive epoch connected with the name of Daedalus, the artist doubtless desired to give to the divine form, up to the measure of his strength, the beauty that hovered before his eyes ; but his hand reluctantly followed his will ; the image that he produced was childishly imperfect. And yet the reverence with which it was regarded by contemporaries, who evidently saw in it a model of perfection, passed from generation to generation, down to later times more skilled in art. Great was the danger of stagnation : ' originals ' might have been created with a monopoly of sanctity, and the sculptors of divine forms in mature times might have felt themselves restrained by them. Then the vision of beauty would have flown away anew, without attaining its final realization.

Great was the triumph of the Greek genius that overcame this danger. Of course the 'Daedalid' statues of the gods with their naïve conventionalism remained in the old temples: the son did not refuse worship to what his father worshipped; tradition renewed its sanctifying force. And if by chance a fire destroyed them, then the love of the worshippers, inherited from times of old, strove to reproduce them as far as possible in the same form—this was the condition for preserving that same feeling. Thus arose so-called 'archaistic' statues, large numbers of which have been preserved. But nothing restrained an artist from making a statue of the same god for a new temple of the god in the form most perfect according to his own conception; the two currents, the conservative and the progressive, flowed on side by side, not in the least hampering each other.

In the sixth century before Christ an ideal of beauty had already been attained in the making of images of the gods, an ideal that remains such even for us: the Pre-Raphaelites have taught us to appreciate the innocent charm of this so-called 'ripe archaic'. Yet individualization was lacking. Of course nobody could mistake Posidon for Apollo or the reverse: the beard or the lack of it settled the question. But yet the gods were like one another and like men; we distinguish them only by their attributes:

the trident characterizes Posidon; the wand with serpents, Hermes; the thunderbolt, Zeus; the lion's skin, Heracles; and so on.

This was still imperfection; following generations, in the fifth and fourth centuries, were successful in overcoming it. We shall ill appreciate Phidias, Alcamenes, and Praxiteles, if we see in them only artists, even of religious sculpture: they were genuine prophets, prophets of the chisel. The same work which the prophets of the Old Testament performed for ancient Israel—the creation of a clear-cut, lofty, and at the same time harmonious conception of deity—that same work artists performed for the ancient Hellenes, and, moreover, so much the more successfully as an image is more powerful than a word. On a dogmatic and narrative basis the creation of unity was impossible: there was no central organ which possessed the strength or even—for we are in Greece—the desire to annihilate everything that opposed it; ceremonial rites therefore differed widely in different states. But from the moment that Phidias created his Zeus of Olympia it was impossible to imagine the god in any other form. Yes, that was verily he, a god majestic but kindly, 'father of gods and men'; such indeed was he at the moment when he promised the mother who embraced his knees that he would fulfil her prayer:

He spoke, and under his dark brows the nod
Vouchsafed of confirmation. All around

The Sovereign's everlasting head his curls
Ambrosial shook, and huge Olympus reeled.

[Iliad, i. 528-530 : tr. adapted from COWPER.]

And evidently, in the face of this majestic beauty, all petty and vulgar conceptions with which intellectual immaturity or the caprice of poets had defiled the image of the Olympian must vanish away like smoke ; with it there were in harmony only the most noble, the most majestic, the most Aeschylean ideas :

Weighing all other names I fail to guess
Aught else but Zeus, if I would cast aside,
Clearly, in very deed,

From off my soul this idle weight of care.

[AESCHYLUS, Agamemnon, 163-166, ed. Weil :
tr. PLUMPTRE.]

And never again could a man be completely unhappy, to whom the lord of the world had once revealed himself in his Olympian form.

Yet with all its graciousness, his was a stern beauty. Still sterner was his spouse, the Argive Hera of Polyclitus, the contemporary of Phidias, Hera the Fulfiller, the guardian of the sacrament of marriage for Grecian women, of marriage with its stern duties to which the careless freedom of a maiden's life must give place. And equally stern was the Athena revealed to his nation by Phidias, Athena the Maiden, denizen of the Parthenon that was named in her honour, who pointed out to an Athenian his duties as a warrior and a citizen, but who also, in return for the performance of these duties, defended his country by her prayers before the throne of her mighty father, as Solon, the ancient lawgiver of Athens, had said of her :

Our city everlastingly shall stand ;
 So Zeus and all the immortal gods command :
 Athenian Pallas lends her heavenly aid,
 She of the mighty father, heavenly maid.

[Cited by DEMOSTHENES, On the Embassy, 254 :
 tr. adapted from KENNEDY.]

This sternness was decidedly mitigated in the figure of Demeter, the mother-goddess, the kindly nourisher and comforter of man ; we do not know to whom we owe the statue that became her type, but one kindred to it in expression has been preserved to us in a good copy, the statue of Irene, the beneficent goddess of peace, modelled near the beginning of the fourth century by the sculptor Cephisodotus. It begins the new epoch of religious sculpture which followed the Peloponnesian War, the epoch of the younger prophets, who revealed to the Greeks and to ourselves the nature of their subordinate and younger gods. At the head of these sculptors stand Praxiteles and Lysippus. At this time three beautiful types of youthful god were created. Only one of them has been preserved to us in the original of its creator, Praxiteles, but its superiority to all copies makes us conceive of the two others as equally perfect. Apollo, with his form of more than earthly slenderness and lightness, was the ideal of bright beauty of intellect, the incarnation of spirit, reverie, and will. Dionysus, full of melancholy dreaming, was the god of the hidden charm of nature, attractive but mysterious, like the damp breath of spring with its tidings of awakening, of the coming of life-giving strength. Hermes was elastic youthful strength, the incarnation of action and reality, but of reality as it should be, not as it is.

By their side stood two young female types. Aphrodite, the queen of the charm of love, was the justification of life-giving sensuousness in the purity of beauty. I beg the reader not to think so much of the famous 'Medicean Venus', which already has a faint odour of the court licence of Alexandrianism (in consequence of which it so perfectly suited the taste of the classicism of the gallants of the seventeenth century) as of the Aphrodite of Praxiteles, despite the serious imperfection of the copy of it in the Vatican. She corresponds to Dionysus. In the same fashion, to Hermes corresponds Artemis, the divine huntress, strong and agile, as befits a goddess who knows no rest in coursing through the woods and glades, or in dancing by night at the head of a chorus of Dryads. Pallas would have corresponded to Apollo, had not her type been already settled by the religious sculpture of the preceding epoch; and after all the well-known 'Pallas Giustiniani' may have been an approximation of the ideal of Phidias to the more earthly tendencies of the fourth century. The loftiness of the conceptions of Phidias and Polyclitus did not exclude such transformations : the Olympian Zeus and the Argive Hera were likewise subject to them ; and the busts of Zeus (' Otricoli ') and of Hera (' Ludovisi '), which all my readers know, and which aroused the well-founded enthusiasm of Winckelmann and of Goethe, are really just such justified metamorphoses in the spirit of the religio-artistic needs of the fourth century.

Posidon was the own brother of Zeus ; but beside him he was what the sea, full of stormy motion, is in comparison with the majestic calm of the sky. Lysippus understood this ; in his Posidon he expressed just this quality of stormy violence. Though the face of his Posidon is like that of Zeus, yet it lacks the calm ' nodding of the brows ' of the ruler of Olympus ; his brows are raised threateningly, as is his hair also ; his whole figure is the strength of a raging wave incarnate in a divine form. The ' true son of Zeus ' was Heracles, born a mortal ; but earthly sufferings left their stamp on him, and so created a veritable tragedy of divine manhood. Sophocles expressed this in poetry, Lysippus in sculpture. (Witness the ' Farnese Heracles '.)

Finally, in the third century, this same image of the Zeus of Phidias went through one more transformation and produced, under the chisel of Bryaxis, the last work of Greek religious sculpture, the Sarapis of Alexandria; by this purely Greek deity Ptolemy wished to replace for the Greeks of his kingdom the Egyptian Osiris, the brother and husband of Isis. Thus did Bryaxis understand him, as Zeus of the underworld, the brother of the torch-bearing Demeter of the Eleusinian mysteries, for the Greeks had originally represented Isis in the form of Demeter. Zeus, Posidon, and Sarapis are as it were three brothers, the rulers of the sky, the sea, and the kingdom of the underworld. The curls of Zeus rise and fall in a waving line; the mane of Posidon bristles stormily; the skeins of the hair of Sarapis droop sadly, casting a dark shadow on his serene brow.

I have reserved till the last one more transformation of this same Zeus of Phidias, though it was of earlier date than Bryaxis: I mean Asclepius. This healer of men, their saviour from inexorable death, was goodness personified; the period of the special flourishing of his cult, in his capacity as saviour, began about the time of the birth of Christ.

Before we go further, let us cast a backward glance.

That the race of the Olympians, created by the great Greek artists and incorporated in marble and bronze, was a genuine 'revelation of divinity in beauty', has been felt by other men besides ourselves, to whom, if we except the Olympian Hermes of Praxiteles, not one of those incorporations has come down in the original. If even the copies that have survived and that are preserved in our museums have drawn from a historian of the Christian religion the ecstatic exclamation, 'Very gods, very goddesses!' (Renan)—then how must the originals themselves have acted on the nation for which they were created! As a matter of fact, even the sober and discreet Aristotle testifies: 'Doubtless if men differed from one another in the mere forms of their bodies as much as the statues of the gods do from men, all would acknowledge that the inferior class should be slaves of the superior' (Politics, i. 5, 10: tr. Jowett).

Here we have what was a stumbling-block, and in the opinion of many men still is so: the ancient Greeks worshipped their statues, served them; their cult was 'idolatry'.

Some go still further: pointing to fragmentary forms of this idolatry, which show that in dim ages before the appearance of statues in human form, primitive blocks of all sorts likewise served as objects of worship, they speak of 'fetishism' in the religion of ancient Greece. Excellent: now we have a common religious foundation for the Greeks and for the savages of Upper and Lower Guinea.

First let us examine 'fetishism'. When Portuguese sailors, who in their own country worshipped the Lord Jesus, the Mother of God, and the saints on the canvases of their great masters, became acquainted with the formless blocks of the savages whom I have just mentioned, they gave them the name feitiço, or facticius (deus), that is ' (god) made with hands ', for the reason that in their opinion (whether correct or not is a matter of no consequence) the given tribe of savages beheld in such a block not an image or symbol of a deity existing outside it and independent of it, but the deity itself. Otherwise we should have to term fetishists even the Christians, and not only the Catholics and the Orthodox, but also the Protestants, who admit that the crucifix is something holy ; or else the very term ' fetishism ' would lose all value as the expression of an idea, and would retain value only—as an insult.

And now I inquire : Have we any right to suppose that for King Minos and his subjects the labrys (a double-bladed axe) was not the symbol of Zeus, the caster of thunderbolts, but an independent deity, and that the stonecutter who drew the outline of it on the wall regarded himself as ' making a god ' ? Evidently the dumb memorial can tell us nothing as to the attitude of men towards it. Therefore we must judge according to the analogy of later ages ; that is, we must pass from ' fetishism ' to ' idolatry '.

Here the matter is absolutely clear, from Homer onward. When Zeus promises Thetis that he will fulfil her prayer, when Athena fills the heart of Diomedes with ardour and with valour, when Apollo protects Hector, what have we before us, gods acting by their own free will, or statues made by the hand of man? The question is superfluous, the more so since the Achæan epoch, represented by Homer, knew absolutely no statues. But perhaps in the following epoch, which built temples to the gods and placed their statues in them, there ensued a transformation of religious feeling and in the consciousness of the faithful the statues took the place of the gods that they were meant to represent? Let us see. A throng of many thousand Athenians is gathered in the theatre to witness the Oresteia of Aeschylus; it sees how the hero, pursued by the Erinyes, embraces with his arms the statue of Pallas on the Acropolis; later on Pallas herself descends to him and thus stands beside her statue. Can one not clearly see from this that the statue is only the image of the deity, and not the deity itself?

Yet the Greeks bowed down to their statues. To be sure; but absolutely in the same sense in which faithful followers of the old Christian faiths 'bow down' (the phrase is of no importance here) to the images of Christ, the Mother of God, and the saints; and an Athenian who burned incense before the statue of his Pallas, did so with absolutely the same feeling with which to-day a Catholic or an Orthodox Christian on Saturday evening lights a lamp before the image of the Most Holy Virgin. And as now the faithful distinguish 'miraculous' images from others, and ascribe to them greater sanctity, just so, in absolutely the same way, the statue of Apollo in Magnesia on the Meander was believed to have 'power for all things'. Here the analogy is complete, nor is there anything strange in the fact, for here we are dealing with the ancient foundation of Christianity. On the other hand, it is true that for that very reason the Protestants cannot deny themselves the pleasure of calling us 'idolaters'; but we know nevertheless that, when they speak thus, they merely invent charges against us, and do not argue seriously.

Thanks to the Christian apologists, the reproach of idolatry cleaved to the ancient Greek religion. Christian apologetics in its turn followed after Jewish apologetics, which had its own iconoclastic leaven in the revelations of the Prophets of the Old Testament, but which in its dispute with Hellenism merely repeated the arguments of the Greek philosophical apologetics of the Epicureans, the New Academicians, and the Cynics. In them two arguments were of chief importance.

The first, which is characteristic of philosophical apologetics, pertains to anthropomorphism in general, as the foundation not only of the worship of statues, but of their very existence. It dates from Xenophanes, the rhapsodist and philosopher of the sixth century before Christ. 'The Ethiopians,' he said, 'represent their gods as black, and if horses had the power to make statues of their gods, they would give them the form of a horse' (Fragments, 15, 16: Diels). And what of it? We, men of the twentieth century, and others as well, may reply to this argument with the immortal words of Goethe, 'All that is transitory is naught but a parable' (Faust, Part II., near close), and we may add that even religion itself, as the reflection of the deity in the consciousness of transitory man, is something transitory, is naught but a parable. Let us inquire of Aeschylus what he would reply to Xenophanes. 'O Zeus—whoe'er he be, if that name please him well, by that on him I call' (Agamemnon, 160-162, ed. Weil: tr. adapted from Plumptre), said the prophet of Eleusis, rightly emphasizing the Hellenic feeling of the relativity of our gods, which differed so widely from Semitic exclusiveness. And doubtless in the same spirit he would also have replied to Xenophanes: 'O Zeus, of whatever nature thou art, if it please thee that we worship thee in this form, in this form do we worship thee!'—in a form created, let us assume, by Antenor, and later by Phidias.

But whence did all the Greeks know what was dear to Zeus? Of that we shall speak later.

As a matter of fact it is highly probable that Xenophanes had no need of any such instruction; we have only fragments of his work preserved. It is highly probable that the Greek rhapsodist did not object to the worship of statues, but to the identification of their transitory form with the eternal form of the deity, independent of human feelings. But, I repeat, this whole argument is characteristic only of Hellenicophilosophic apologetics; the Jews, and after them the Christians, who admitted that God created man 'in his image, after his likeness', obviously could not avail themselves of it.

Another argument is more popular. The Greek worships a statue, hence the work of a stonecutter or a founder. He ascribes to man the power of making a god. What an absurdity! Here, I will take and break off the arm of your god; let us see whether he will be able to defend himself and to punish me. And you, blind men, instead of worshipping the work of a man, should worship rather the being who created the man himself, your human god-maker.

This argument is apparently very convincing—and it has shown its force in practice, in dark times and against dark men; but we, Athenians of the fourth and third centuries, see it as it really is, a piece of fundamentally false reasoning, sometimes instinctive, but more often blended with duplicity. We really worship Pallas in the form which Phidias has created for her, but never have we ascribed to her statue the power of self-defence against the blow of a barbarian. If you maim her statue, it will be sacrilege, a sin of the same sort as perjury, disrespect for your parents, or injury to a guest; and you may be sure that the goddess will punish you for it—if not at once, then at some time in the future; if not in this world, then in the next world; if not in your own person, then in the person of your descendants down to the fourth generation and beyond. And apart from that, your act will be an offence to our religious feeling, for which we will punish you in our own name, and at once. As for your expression 'the god-maker', that is a piece of vulgar ignorance on your part. Never will a statue, not even one formed by Phidias himself, be an object of worship for its own sake: while it remains in the artist's workshop he himself and any other man may cut it, may break off what parts he pleases, may even pound it into bits, and that will not be sacrilege. A statue becomes an object of worship only at the moment of consecration (hidrysis), that is, through a religious ceremony of a sacramental character and of great solemnity, of which you may read in the Exegetics of Autoclidēs. The consecration itself must be preceded by an invocation of the god with an inquiry whether he is pleased with the statue which we consecrate to him, and whether he consents to infuse into it a portion of his divine power, in order that henceforth it may be a visible mediator between him, the invisible, and his worshippers. In ordinary cases it suffices to address with this aim in view the local 'exegete' of the Pythian Apollo or the Eleusinian goddesses; on more solemn occasions we send an embassy to Delphi.

But Phidias, when he framed his Olympian Zeus, ventured to address the Cloudgatherer himself with the query whether he was pleased with his statue, and from the heights of the heavens the god cast a thunderbolt, his fiery messenger, at the artist's feet. Journey to Olympia: there they will show you the holy enēlysiōn, the place where smote the thunderbolt of Zeus, bringing joy to us and eternal glory to his prophet.

Let us proceed. Hitherto I have been speaking of only one form of artistic revelation, of sculpture; and of that in only one field, in the field of creating statues as objects of worship. I must here remark that in this connection painting is subordinate: paintings of the gods, as objects of worship, are not found at all in the public cult, and but rarely in the private cults. I shall speak later of painting, and of the other branches of sculpture; at present I have a word to say of architecture.

In those distant times of the 'Achaean epoch', when statues of the gods were unknown, temples were also dispensed with; divine service in the name of the state was celebrated under the open sky, and required an altar, but no temple. The temple developed only gradually, along with the need for a dwelling, of course not for the invisible god, but for his visible form, the statue. Such a temple was most likely an outgrowth and development of the sacred grove; as, for example, was the earliest form of the temple of Delphi recorded by Pausanias. At first men formed an arbour by intertwining its trees, thus providing a shelter for the statue (this custom, which is mentioned by Homer, was preserved in some cults down to the latest times); later they thought it more secure to build a small house among the trees, and finally they transformed this house and the trees that surrounded it into a building wholly or in part of stone: thus arose the cella and its colonnade, the form of 'Greek temple' that we all know, simple but majestic and enchanting. Divine service was celebrated as of old at an altar under the open sky, in front of the temple, and not in the temple, which was only the habitation of the deity, and not a place for assemblies of the faithful. Therefore there was no need for building temples of any great size; even the most magnificent among them were of modest dimensions in comparison with the stone giants of the oriental religions and of Christianity.

Where were the temples built? When the rule of kings came to an end in the Greek states, their acropoleis were transformed from royal citadels into natural tabernacles of the gods; on them, for the most part, the temples were erected. Thus in Athens, on the Acropolis, the temple of Pallas occupied the site of the 'house of Erechtheus' of Achaean times, and inherited its name; and by its side arose other temples of the same goddess, culminating in the Parthenon. Moreover, temples were very desirable in the market-place, where matters of state were decided. The centres of universal Hellenic religious feeling, the sacred groves at Delphi and at Olympia, were full of temples. The Greeks also liked to build them on the highways, outside the city walls, like the churches fuori le mura in Christian Rome, that a traveller might experience from afar the joyous feeling of approach to a city where reigned 'good order' (eunomia). A still more desirable place was a promontory visible from afar to sailors—even to-day a pilgrim who sails past the Attic promontory of Sunium with the white columns of its temple to Posidon, may experience the same warm feeling of intimate divine favour that this temple once aroused in the citizens and guests of Athens.

All these were temples in the highest sense of the term. To complete our picture of the external aspect of Hellenic religion we must include the chapels of the nymphs and local heroes, small and unpretentious, but marvellous in their very simplicity, which inspired meditation ; nor must we forget the grottos and sacred groves, and the modest figures of the rural gods. Here a thyrsus, resting against a fig tree of strange form, or a tympanum hung upon a bough, marked a tree as consecrated to Dionysus ; there a herm of Pallas peered forth from the hole of an olive tree ; there again a boundary column was crowned by the head of Hermes or of Pan. Everywhere was an appropriate mingling of nature with art in a general harmony of religious feeling such as Mother Earth has seen but once in her long life. A man of to-day may gain an idea of it from the Pompeian painted landscapes, especially those small and modest landscapes which are not widely known and which do not at once attract the attention of visitors to the ruins of the dumb city and the halls of the museum at Naples.

Sculpture, to which I now return, lent its aid here also : sculpture adorned the temple which served as the dwelling of the god which a sculptor had created. If the temple as a whole, in accordance with the leading principle of Greek tectonics, was a natural and yet beautiful expression of the work of constructive forces, sculpture adorned the repose which ensued upon this work, that is, the flat places in which the opposing forces counterbalanced each other. Such were the pediment, the flat triangle of the façade between the horizontal line of the cornice and the copings of the roof, and the metopes, or quadrangles of the frieze between the triglyphs which supported the cornice. Here there was room for whole groups of statuary, large on the pediments, small on the metopes. And each group of statuary gave an opportunity for the portrayal of mythology, that poetic religion which is not binding on the faithful, which is just as beautiful as the citizen's religion but still subordinate to it. So let the chisel carve on the pediments scenes of the birth of Pallas and of her dispute with Posidon over the Attic land, or scenes of the contests of Pelops and Oenomaüs and of the rape of the women of the Lapithae by the wild Centaurs: nobody is obliged to believe that all this took place as represented, or that it ever took place at all. But the contemplation of these beautiful white figures on the dark, painted background fills us with a spirit of majestic beauty, and through it with the spirit of religion.

Finally, the votive offerings. They crowded the 'cella', the vestibules, the spaces between the columns, the steps of the temple, and its near vicinity: statues, bas-reliefs, pictures, all were gathered together here. Each temple was a museum, but a museum consecrated to the glory of the deity and thereby directing anew the soul of the spectator through beauty to religion. Thus the enclosures of the gods most widely worshipped by all the Hellenes, of Apollo at Delphi, of Demeter and Cora at Eleusis, of Pallas on the Acropolis, and of Zeus at Olympia, were absolute kingdoms of religious beauty and of beautiful religion. When one reads even the dry catalogues of Pausanias, one's soul weeps at that vanished beauty, filled with spirit, a beauty such as the world was never to behold again. And yet Pausanias surveyed it in the second century after Christ, after the devastations of many pitiless wars and the plunderings of Roman governors: what then must it have been in those times to which our thoughts have gone back, in the flourishing fourth and third centuries before Christ?

The beauty of a motionless image was only one of two forms of the revelation of divinity; the second was the beauty—of word, will the reader prompt me? No. The Greek would not have been a Greek if he had so limited the domain subject to his Muse. No, the second was all beauty that is the expression of moving, transitory feeling, not only in word, but in music, and not only in music, but in dumb gesture. I am here speaking of the complete activity of the Hellenic Muse, of the triune choreia, composed in equal degree of poetry, music, and the dance. All these arts were consecrated to the divinity, but supreme among the three was the dance.

This is a matter organically incomprehensible to the religious feeling of modern times. For some reason or other—whether owing to the heavy raiment worn in oriental countries, or to the cause of that raiment, an unnatural and exaggerated effort to cover modestly the forms of the body, as something essentially unclean, or possibly owing to its own deep-rooted dislike for visible images of all sorts—Judaism, the negative source of Christianity, has absolutely obliterated in the heirs of the ancient Greek religious feeling, even their capacity for understanding this important basis of that feeling. What man among us can thoroughly appreciate those weighty words of Plato: ‘Our young people must not merely dance well, they must dance good things’! (Abbreviated from Laws, ii. 654.) In order to apprehend their sense we need an analogy from the domain of the word: ‘Not only to speak well, but to speak good things’. And meanwhile psychology teaches us that a gesture is far more immediate and more convincing than a word, and logic bids us confess that accordingly a poem of gesture—or a dance in the proper antique meaning of the word—if it were really created, would stir our souls far more powerfully than the most inspired poem of words can possibly stir them. To-day some persons, kindled with an enthusiasm derived from antique sources, are making attempts to ‘liberate the body’, to give back to plastic gesture its ancient rights. Though their efforts would certainly have made on the ancient Greeks the same impression that the exercises in articulate speech of a dumb man who is being taught to speak in his adult years make on us, yet we should hail them with joy and support them: perchance our grandsons will succeed in unearthing the buried temple, in giving back to man his lost fullness of life.

The Greeks knew this fullness—but alas, not even they invented any notation for the dance, and therefore the inspired poems of the ancient choreographers, which were imparted to others only by means of imitative performance, have perished for ever. We can speak only of their significance, and how great it was we may judge from the fact that all the greater festivals were combined with dances of maidens, those flowers of the race. Besides this, the young men showed their beauty in the most diverse physical exercises, on foot and on horseback, in light garments or in arms; and in Athens even old men of noble form with olive branches in their hands marched in the procession in honour of the goddess—this was their choreia.

Music and poetry, as elements of the choreia which was one element of the divine service, are immediately intelligible even to us, owing to the fact that our church has preserved them and developed them. The ancient religion was also familiar with spiritual music; it accompanied spiritual poetry, which was of extremely varied types, and it certainly was itself equally varied ; it was simple in its means but powerful in its effect. But we know very little about it. We know best the spiritual poetry of the Greeks, though even here our information is extremely fragmentary. Only the highest form of the triune choreia stands before us in the full light of history—the drama ; but again only in its verbal, not in its musical and orchestric aspect. The drama was the most perfect expression of the Dionysian idea ; only on that religious background can it be completely understood.

Our picture would be very incomplete, if, in speaking of the choric element in the Hellenic divine service, we did not properly emphasize a certain feature which invariably accompanies it—agonistics. While understanding in proper fashion the idea of equality, as a potential equality, that is, the general accessibility of good things in proportion to the absolutely different talents of different men, the ancient democracy consecrated by its religion the tendency to competition, that spur to the exertion and the development of all individual forces for the common good. And it did so in the most various forms. We easily understand competition in gymnastic exercises ; here agonistics is the soul of the whole matter. Agonistics in the choreia is less intelligible to us ; yet here too it was an inevitable feature. Different groups of girls competed, engaging in choral dances ; adults competed, noted rhapsodists, who recited Homer at the festival of the Panathenaea ; but rhapsodists of tender years also competed, the sons of citizens, reciting Homer at the festival of the Apaturia. Tragic poets competed at the festival of Dionysus ; choruses likewise competed, executing the ' lyric ' (that is, the specifically choric) parts of the tragedy ; finally, the actors who took the principal parts also competed. Nor is this all ; agonistics consecrated to a certain degree even the lower, vulgar forms of popular merriment : at the Rural Dionysia a prize was given to the man who could stand longest on one bare foot on a full wine skin smeared with olive oil ; at the Anthesteria to the man who could first, at a sign given by a herald, empty a tankard of wine.

To be sure, similar things happen among us, also, wherever popular merrymakings are held. But here is something that excites amazement. A recently discovered fragment of Herodas informs us of the agōn eupaidiās on the last day of the Thesmophoria : a prize was given to the happy mother who had given birth to the most beautiful child during the year. The details of the matter are unknown, but the fact is established.

The most beautiful—even here Hellas remained faithful to herself. And at the festival of Demeter Thesmophoros, Demeter the Lawgiver. For god reveals himself in beauty—such is the faith of the Hellene, blasphemously forgotten by his heirs.

V

THE CONSECRATION OF HUMAN SOCIETY

WE are now passing to those aspects of Greek religion that have been termed 'higher'—though a certain apostasy from Mother Earth was necessary in order to call them such in distinction from those that we have discussed previously. We must first speak of the religious consecration of human society: or, on the one hand, of the family, the clan, and the tribe; on the other, of the group and corporation; and further, of the city, the state, Hellas, humanity.

The central element of the family, that germ-cell of a society of citizens, which was bound together by possessing one common roof, was constituted by a divine being, the household hearth. The depth of the religious feeling of the Greeks expressed itself in the fact that for them (and apparently for them only) this was a being of feminine gender, the goddess Hestia. While she is one of the oldest deities, she changes before our very eyes, one may say, from an immanent deity, such as she is in Homer, to a transcendent deity. For Hesiod she is already an individual goddess, the sister of Zeus, like Hera and Demeter; but in contrast to them she is a maiden: that is because her element is the flame of fire. The late date of her change to a transcendent deity caused images of her to be infrequent: even in the public temples no statues were erected to her, and she was worshipped in her symbol, the undying fire on the altar within the temple. In the house the case was evidently the same.

Having a constant abode on the hearth that was consecrated to her, Hestia was a true symbol of the mistress of the house, whose activity, as distinguished from the activity of her husband, went on within the house; immediate bonds united Hestia with the house-mistress. And while, in consequence of the 'patrilinear' organization of the Greek family, the house and all other possessions normally passed from father to son, and the children took their names from the name of the father, for Hestia matrilinear succession was the law. When a young wife was conducted to the house of her husband, her mother walked in front with a torch that had been lighted at the hearth of her house, and with this torch she lighted a new fire on the hearth of her daughter and son-in-law—a beautiful symbol of all that household tradition which thenceforward was to pass from the mother through the daughter, the young mistress, into the new house. Thus conducted into the house, Hestia becomes its goddess-protectress, potent and gracious. Of the intimacy and the heartfelt character of this relation we have testimony in the moving prayer spoken by Alcestis before her death, in the play of Euripides :

She . . . before Hestia's altar stood, and prayed :
 ' Queen, for I pass beneath the earth, I fall
 Before thee now, and nevermore, and pray :—
 Be mother to my orphans : mate with him
 A loving wife, with her a noble husband.
 Nor, as their mother dieth, so may they,
 My children, die untimely, but with weal
 In the home-land fill up a life of bliss.'

[Alcestis, 162-169 : tr. adapted from WAY.]

In return for these benefactions she was regarded with great honour. In prayers addressed to many gods it was the custom to mention her first : ' Hestia, from whom reason bids us begin ', says the old king in the Phaëthon of the same Euripides (Fragment 781 : Nauck); the expression, ' to begin from Hestia ', even became proverbial. The master of the house prayed to her when he started on a journey, and he greeted her when he returned home. When a child was born in the house, it was carried round the hearth on the fifth day, more or less, and was thus presented to Hestia ; this was a genuine family festival (the Amphidromia), in which all present at the birth of the child took part ; it was accompanied by a banquet. Every one who sat by the hearth (ephestios) was holy ; by this act a fugitive could ordinarily secure the protection of the man to whom he turned for help.

Just as Hestia was the female element of a family, so its male element was Zeus of the Garth (Zeus Herkeios), who stood beside his altar in the courtyard. Here took place the household sacrifices, conducted by the master of the house : before the sacrifice he plunged a burning brand from the altar into a pail of water and with this consecrated water sprinkled all present, both members of the household and guests, both free-men and slaves. This sprinkling (chernips) was a sacramental act, strengthening the bonds that united those present ; therefore exclusion from the ceremony of sprinkling was a punishment visited on godless men. The sacrifice was combined with a banquet, and may even be said to have mainly depended on it : in honour of the god there were burned only symbolic portions of the sacrificed beast, such as had little value for food ; the remainder was consumed by the invited guests, who thus became ' fellow-banqueters of the gods '. The Greeks understood perfectly that a god needed worship, expressed by a symbol, and not material food ; therefore the annihilation of a sacrificial animal by a ' holocaust ' was not one of their customs. On the other hand, the scarcity of animal food caused every slaying of a beast to be accompanied by a sacrifice, so that even our word to slaughter (an animal) had as its Greek correspondent 'to make a sacrifice of' (hiereuein, thyein), a term which also certainly gave expression to the delicacy of feeling on which I have commented above (p. 45).

Other gods, varying in different circumstances, might of course also be guardians of the house; the spirits of the ancestors of the master ordinarily had this function. This again is one of the sides of Greek religion most closely connected with household life. The spirits of the ancestors live; the master of the house bestows on them the gifts and liquid offerings hallowed by custom; they are therefore concerned that his family may prosper and may preserve the purity of its blood, of their blood. From their habitation beneath the earth the spirits of the ancestors 'send aloft good' to their descendant; the living invite them to take part in the joy of the marriage feast, which is their joy to an equal degree; and it is no wonder that they pursue with implacable wrath the sinful wife who, breaking her vow of conjugal fidelity, has interrupted the hereditary continuity of their blood and has introduced 'falsified children' to them and into her house. And since an Erinyes developed from the angry soul of a dead man, one can readily understand that she punished the adultery of a wife with the same severity as murder. The Electra of Sophocles utters this prayer :

And ye, Erinyes, daughters of the gods,
 Ye dreaded ones who look
 On all who perish, slain unrighteously,
 On all whose bed is stealthily defiled,
 Come ye, and help, avenge my father's death.

[Electra, 112-116: tr. PLUMPTRE.]

The adultery of a husband, as an offence to the womanly feelings of his wife, was likewise condemned by custom and, in case the injured wife made complaint, by law, but for the reasons stated above it was not a religious transgression.

' A man must cling to the eternal life of the world by leaving behind him his children's children so that they may minister to god in his place ', says Plato (Laws, 773 E), and Farnell justly calls these words ' the most exalted conception concerning the duty of marriage and paternity that has ever been embodied in ethical or religious literature ' (The Higher Aspects of Greek Religion, p. 36). From this point of view one can understand that, according to the Greek conception, marriage was a sacrament. It was even directly called such—telos ; its patrons, the first married pair, Zeus and Hera, when their character as such was emphasized, were called teleioi. To be sure, one might interpret this epithet in a different fashion ; but in the present case the decisive argument is the fact that in Athens at the marriage ceremony a boy, the son of living parents, carried a basket of bread around the newly wedded pair, repeating meanwhile the sacramental words that the mysteries had made well known : ' I have fled from evil, I have found good '. Evil is temporality, good is eternity, both in marriage and in the mysteries : the immortality of the species, which is dependent on marriage, answers to the immortality of the soul, of which the mysteries give evidence. In complete agreement with this is the fact that the newly married pair were met in their marriage chamber by the priestess of Demeter, the goddess of the reviving grain, the goddess of the mysteries, and that only after her blessing did the marriage night begin for them. And Farnell is again perfectly correct when he says : ' St. Paul's words in his Epistle to the Ephesians (v. 32), " Great is this mystery ", which were momentous for the marriage-theory of the later Church, were in accordance both in spirit and in verbal form with earlier Hellenic religious custom rather than with Hebraic ' (Ibid. p. 34).

I have just called Zeus and Hera the first married pair ; in truth their ' holy marriage ' (hieros gamos) was the primal type of human marriages, and furthermore, as is proved by a recently discovered fragment of the oldest prose work of the Greeks, the mystical book of Pherecydes of Syros, in the minutest details of their ritual. The memory of this holy marriage was celebrated in January, which was called ' the month of marriages' (Gamēliōn), in accord with the custom in agricultural Greece of contracting marriages primarily in winter. Thus the first fruits of mankind ripened at more or less the same time as the fruits of Mother Earth, and in the month Pyanepsion (October) men could celebrate both the festival of the fathers, Apaturia, and that of the mothers, Thesmophoria: a beautiful piece of evidence, in my opinion, of the eternal unity of man and nature.

This unity expressed itself still more cogently in the person of the goddess to whom women in childbed addressed their prayers. This was not Hera or even Demeter, the goddess of marriages recognized by the state, and of family life: a woman citizen brought into the world the fruit of her womb according to the same laws as every female of the woods, and one and the same goddess guarded both. This goddess we already know; she was Artemis.

Evidently a family consecrated by such religious grace united its members by unusually strong mutual bonds. Though the law gave the father no authority over the life and death of the children, as in Rome, yet the person of the father, and in a still higher degree that of the mother, was sacred to the children. 'An old father or mother should enjoy honour in a house no less than the images of the gods; the curses of parents reach the ears of the gods more swiftly than any others, and so it is with their blessings ; the god himself rejoices in the honour which children and grand-children bestow on their parents and grand-parents ' (Plato, Laws, 930 E ff. abridged). And no one can set free a son from the duty of supporting and honouring his father to the very day of his death, provided only that that father has not previously been untrue to his obligations with regard to his son, by neglecting his education. Equally holy were the mutual obligations of brothers and sisters ; in regard to them it is sufficient to mention the Antigone of Sophocles. As a matter of fact, the history of the Greek states, however many dark pictures we may find in it, furnishes no examples of the combat of fathers with sons or of brothers with one another, such as so often soil the annals of the Germanic and the Slavic peoples. If in the fourth century Timoleon of Corinth killed his brother, it was only because that brother had become the tyrant of his native land, and because in the soul of the hero, after a fearful internal struggle, the duty of a citizen triumphed over the duty of a brother.

But the Greek family included slaves as well as freemen ; they too were united with it ' by bonds of sprinkling ' ; they too profited by the protection of Hestia and Zeus of the Garth. To these deities they were presented on the day when they were included in the family ; and custom bade that at the same time they should be showered with sweetmeats, as a good omen, that they might have a 'sweet' life in the house of their new masters. Progress had been made since the Achaean epoch of Homer, seeing that the master no longer had power over the life and death of his menials: the murder of a slave by his master was not only punished by the law, but constituted a religious transgression which defiled the house in which it was committed. And the Greeks were fully conscious that such a view of the sacredness of a slave's life distinguished them from other nations. In general, we must remember that the popular idea of the horrors of 'ancient' slavery applies only to the epoch of the Roman latifundia, when the 'plantation' system of agriculture on large tracts of land, which had been invented by Carthage, began to prevail. In Greece, as Plato and the comic writers prove, the life of slaves was quite tolerable: their share in the common life of the family gave their personal life far more content than if they had been strictly confined to its narrow bounds. Evidently slavery must come to an end, and it did so thanks to watchwords first uttered by Greece itself; but if the forms of life are to be appraised according to the degree of the sense of happiness native to them, then an impartial judge will be bound to admit that, in the final analysis, Greek society, even the enslaved portion of it, was happier than our own with its centrifugal tendencies, which have long divided us from Mother Earth, which to-day divide us from one another, and which introduce isolation and coldness where once there was shelter and warmth in the beams of Hestia.

The intermediate links between the family and the community of citizens (polis) were the clan, the phratry, and the tribe (by descent). Politically they had lost their importance all over Greece, in some places earlier, in others later—in Athens at the time of the reforms of Clisthenes in the year 507 B.C.—and they would have vanished for ever, had not religion duly consecrated them, as the expanding concentric circles of human society. So they retained religious importance.

To be sure, the importance of the clan was limited to the private cult. The clan included families the kinship of which was proved by a common genealogy; Zeus was the patron of it, but instead of Zeus Herkeios, as in the family, Zeus Homognios, whose title expressed the 'unity of the clan'. Custom bade a man invite his kindred to family solemnities, such as weddings, the occasions when names were given to children, and funeral banquets. Further than this the institution apparently amounted to nothing.

Of greater importance was the phratry, which united together clans that were derived from a common (mythical) founder, without settled genealogy. They had their public festival; it was the three-day 'festival of the fathers', with which we are already familiar, the Apaturia, in October.

The members of a phratry gathered together; to them the happy fathers presented their newborn children along with witnesses who testified to the legitimacy of their descent; and the children were entered in the lists of members of the phratry, which, like our church records, had legal authority. This official business of course did not occupy three days: custom required a banquet, for which these same fathers provided the sacrificial beasts—a larger one (koureion) for a boy, and a smaller one (meion) for a girl. Nor was this all: the members of the phratry were also interested in the fruits of previous years, whom they had entered on the list of citizens. Boys came forward and displayed the results of their education, reciting Homer from memory—and the most eminent among the young rhapsodists received prizes.

Finally, there were festivals of the tribes (by descent), but we know almost nothing about them.

From the individual through the family, the clan, the phratry, and the tribe to the state was one series of steps, notably shortened during the historic epoch owing to the disappearance of three of the intermediate stages. But there was another series, which arose at the opening of the historic epoch: competing with the family organization, it gathered together similar individuals in groups, or in corporations, and in these forms of collective life subordinated them to the community of citizens. In some states the organization by groups gained the supremacy, so far as this was possible, over that by families: thus it was in Sparta. In others, of which we hear little, the family organization remained untouched. In Athens the two were of equal importance.

The corporations, in so far as they had a craft character, were united by a common cult of the gods who were patrons of their crafts: with these gods we are already partially acquainted. But if they were formed by voluntary association, then each of them chose its own god or guardian hero. An important part of the life of these corporations naturally consisted in observing the festivals of these gods and heroes, along with the usual sacrifices and banquets, and sometimes with games and the like. The corporations of intellectual workers, founded by poets, artists, or philosophers, are of special interest to us. After death the founder of one of them became a sort of hero for the members of the corporation who remained alive, down to late generations.

From these corporations, which united men of mature years, and often for all their lives, we distinguish the groups of persons of the same age, for the most part youths and maidens. Formed by the Delphic religion, they were consecrated to the Delphic deities, those of the youths to Apollo, and those of the maidens to Artemis. But this was the later Artemis, the maiden sister of Apollo, identified only by a process of historic evolution with the ancient goddess of the forest and its fertility, with whom a maiden would again come in contact when, after passing through the test of Hera and Demeter, she invoked her as the goddess of childbirth. We here touch an infinitely charming field of Greek life, the contests of youths and maidens in dance and in song. On this foundation friendship likewise developed, the cult of which was nowhere so powerful and so holy as among the Greeks. We cannot linger long upon it, although it involves an important part of Greek beauty—and Plato with his idealistic philosophy can be completely understood only on this foundation.

The crown of human society was, however, according to Greek conceptions to a greater degree than according to any others, the state; or, to speak more exactly, the Hellenic variant of it, the city-state, the independent and self-sufficing polis. This too was naturally placed under the protection of religion—and with such zeal, with such ardour, that many modern investigators have erroneously thought it possible to consider all Greek religion from the point of view of its state character.

A myth—like all other myths, of no binding character—relates that once the gods, gathered at Sicyon (but why there in particular, we do not know), divided among themselves the cities of men. Thus Hera received Argos, the Dioscuri Sparta, Ares Thebes ; as to Athens, there was a dispute between Posidon and Pallas, which was settled in a way that we already know (p. 49). Henceforward Pallas was the goddess-guardian of Athens ; to her prayers before the throne of Zeus the city owed its life and health. When the Persian host pressed on from the East, then it seemed that

Pallas has not been able to soften the lord of Olympus, Though she has often prayed him, and urged him with excellent counsel.

And yet she succeeded in winning one boon from him :

Then far-seeing Zeus grants this to the prayers of Athene : Safe shall the wooden wall continue for thee and thy children.

[Delphic oracle, HERODOTUS, vii. 141 :
tr. RAWLINSON.]

And thanks to the fact that the best citizen of Athens, Themistocles, succeeded in understanding correctly the will of the goddess, that the ' wooden wall ' signified the bulwarks of the vessels, her city was preserved even on this occasion.

So in Athens Pallas was the goddess ' of the Citadel', (Polias, Poliouchos); her festival, the Panathenaea, which we already know and which occurred in July, was the festival of the community as such. Many days were consecrated to contests of all sorts, which gave the community an opportunity to take delight in the strength, the agility, and the beauty of its young people. Whoever, while executing a 'dance in full armour', held his shield unskilfully, with a feeble hand, lower than his breast, the citizens put to shame, saying that he 'forgot Tritogeneia' (that is, Pallas). But most solemn of all was the last day, the day of the hecatomb, when to the goddess on her Acropolis was presented her whole community in most beautiful and most fitting pomp, when took place the famous 'Panathenaic procession' to her temple—the procession that was sculptured by Phidias on the frieze of the Parthenon 'cella'. In it were venerable old men with branches of the olive, the tree of Pallas, and men in the prime of life, with the sacrificial animals, and youths on horseback, and the ornament of the procession, beautiful maidens carrying baskets, and even little girls, the 'Arrhephoroe'; but the heroines of the solemn occasion were the matrons, pupils of the goddess, who had woven in her honour the festival peplos with a representation of her own heroic deeds in combat with the dark powers of the Giants, and also with the likenesses of the most deserving citizens, whom the city by their hands, skilled in the weaver's art, recommended to the grace of its magnanimous patroness.

The state character of Greek religion was expressed also in the fact that the festivals of the other gods as well were celebrated with the co-operation of the state ; this was inevitable, seeing that they must take place under the open sky, on the streets and squares, and not in the seclusion of private houses. Nor was this all : since agonistics and, above all, choreia were an almost obligatory part of these festivals, they became a genuine school for the education of the citizens—and the democracy rightly took pains that even the poorest among them should share in their benefits. This occasioned the introduction of the so-called theorikon, that is, the distribution of very modest doles (two or three obols apiece) to the indigent, that they might share in the solemnities. On the other hand, these solemnities were, one may say, the greatest adornment of the life of an Athenian ; while the reveries of a modern man fly away to egoistic, centrifugal aims, in the centripetal soul of the Greek, and above all of the Athenian, they clustered about his beloved festivals, those in which all citizens participated.

To a certain degree also the private religious feeling of the citizens was a matter of care for the state, but only in so far as it affected the preservation of ceremonies ordained by the fathers according to the directions of the gods ;

the state did not interfere in matters of conscience. Athenian parents gladly conducted to the temple of Athena their betrothed daughters, and in return, after the marriage, her priestess visited the young matron, bringing to the woman citizen and future mother of citizens the blessing of the goddess guardian. And when a citizen was entrusted with a public office, his entrance on it was preceded by an inquiry whether he was fulfilling the obligations of his hereditary cult, whether he was honouring the graves of his ancestors. This inquiry was occasioned by the fear that in case of his negligence the wrath of the gods might make itself felt even in his conduct of the public function that had been entrusted to him.

Many men, it is true, are disturbed by certain events which indicate that the Greeks, and in particular the Athenians, were not entirely free from religious intolerance. The most famous of these is, of course, the condemnation of Socrates by the restored Athenian democracy in the year 399 B.C. ; he was charged as follows : ‘ Socrates is a doer of evil, and corrupter of the youth, and he does not believe in the gods of the state, and has other new divinities of his own ’ (Plato, Apology, 24 : tr. Jowett). Yet such men show that they do not understand the case. Neither in Athens nor anywhere else in Greece was there a law that could be made to cover the offence of which Socrates was accused. This is the distinction in principle between the attitude of Athens and of Greece towards religion and the legalized intolerance of modern states. According to our ideas, under such conditions no trial can even be held, for nullum crimen sine lege. In Athens this was still possible, but in this case the blame for a show of intolerance falls not on the state, as a permanent law-abiding institution, but on the composition of the jury in the given case. We know that its members acted under the influence of the mood of the moment : the state had just freed itself from the rule of the ' thirty tyrants ' whose leader was Critias, unfortunately a pupil of Socrates and apparently an eloquent example of the ' corruption of youth ' by the seventy-year-old sage.

The Greeks can more justly be reproached with quite the opposite quality, with excessive tolerance for a low type of religious observances found among foreign nations, which had free entry into this most hospitable of lands. To be sure, immoral cults, with which a cruel or a licentious ritual was blended, were forbidden. Yet exceptions occur ; and we must condemn the Corinthians in that, when they were masters of international trade in the seventh and sixth centuries before Christ, they admitted into their maritime city, under the name of Aphrodite, the Semitic Astarte with her hierodoulia, or religious prostitution. ' We were the rivals of the Phoenicians,' the Corinthians would reply in their own defence ; ' we overcame them : yet we could not refuse worship to a goddess who so evidently was their protectress on the sea.' It was an impious act, however, to introduce into their own land a repulsive barbarian custom and to defile with it the pure figure of the ancient Hellenic goddess of love and beauty. The Athenians, the successful rivals of the Corinthians in the sixth and fifth centuries before Christ, did not imitate them in this respect, and of course they were right in not doing so.

We shall touch briefly on some other signs of the religious consecration of civil society. Since the state was only a further stage in the development of the family, and the city in that of the house, we shall not be surprised at finding in the city-state a sacred hearth as its centre, and Hestia as the goddess of it. It was located in the prytaneum, the meeting-place of those organs in the state government of which the activity never ceased ; here burned the undying fire of the goddess, and the term hestiouchos polis, ' the hearth-possessing city-state ', points to its sanctity. As the house, beside Hestia, possessed a representative of the male element in its household life in the person of Zeus of the Garth, so the state worshipped its own Zeus of the City, Zeus Polieus. With his festival (the Dipolia) was connected the ceremony of the Bouphonia, which we have mentioned above (p. 45) ; this fact alone is enough to prove the ancient origin of the festival. And Plato, as an Athenian, was quite right when in his Laws (745 B) he dedicated the Acropolis of his ideal city to Zeus, Hestia, and Athena.

As the household worshipped the souls of its ancestors, so the state bestowed religious worship on the souls of its dead citizens at the festival of the Anthesteria, which corresponded to our All Souls' Day. Only All Souls' Day falls on November 2, at the close of the church year, while the Greek religion, true to its close connection with nature, celebrated its Anthesteria (or 'Flower Festival') in February, when after the frosts of winter the pores of the earth open and, together with the first flowers of spring, the souls of the dead fly forth from under its covering. But the Anthesteria, as we have already seen (p. 48), was also a festival of Dionysus; in truth, by virtue of a beautiful symbolism, the return of the souls was likened to the return of the vine, which had been buried in autumn, to the surface of the earth in a new, spiritualized form. The souls were invited into the dwellings of the living; there they were welcomed with food, drink, and pageants, in order to secure their favour for the coming year, and later they were driven back to their subterranean abode with the words: 'Out of the door, ye souls! the Anthesteria is over!' Mickiewicz, the national poet of Poland, has described similar ceremonies and charms in his poem Forefathers' Eve.

While it worshipped all souls, the city distinguished among them certain elect souls, whom it made the subject of a special cult: these were its local heroes, in the religious sense of the term. Often these were really men who had once lived and who by their merits had attained 'heroization', which corresponded to the canonization of the ancient Christian religions. In cities of recent origin such in particular were their founders, 'foundation-heroes'. But since every city was founded by some one, each of them must have its founder-hero; if tradition had not preserved his name, it was assumed to have been identical with the name of the city: that is, it was supposed that the hero gave to the city his own name. On this basis Sparta (or Lacedaemon) worshipped its hero Lacedaemon; Corinth, its hero Corinthus. Athens was of course an exception, for this was a city founded by a deity. Yet even here there was no lack of local heroes. One of them, enigmatic enough in our time, was the hero Academus, whose grove sheltered for nine centuries the school of Plato, owing to which fact his name still lives in all our 'academies'. Cimon introduced the cult of Theseus, the king who founded Athens, if not as a city, as the capital of Attica; the introduction of this cult was the result of the 'transfer of the relics' of the hero from the island of Scyros to Athens. There were also other heroes.

As a matter of course, important public occasions in which the life of the city expressed itself, assemblies of the people, trials, and the like were consecrated by religious ceremonies which corresponded to our solemn divine services in similar cases. But we cannot go into details.

The Greek idea of statehood did not extend farther than the city. Nevertheless the Greeks possessed a consciousness of their national unity. This was based in the first place on their language, which, despite its numerous dialects, was their common possession: for this reason the Greeks contrasted themselves with the 'barbarians', a word which was originally quite innocent and meant merely men who spoke an unintelligible tongue. But their consciousness of unity rested also on their common possession of many customs (the 'common laws of Hellas'), and, above all else on the fact that they recognized the same gods under the same names. On this basis the unification of Hellas was accomplished, so far as it was accomplished at all. Its legal form was the amphictyony.

Amphictyons means 'those who dwell around'. Around what? Always around a temple. A temple required protection: it possessed, besides a building, votive offerings, often of great value, flocks and herds, and land. It could not defend itself, hence the 'dwellers round about', the amphictyons, defended it.

This was a bond that united them. Thus the cities of Euboea defended their common temple of Artemis Amarynthia; and when the two most important of them, Chalcis and Eretria, began against each other the long 'Lelantian War', in which all Greece took part (in the seventh century B.C.), they bound themselves not to employ missile weapons, and they entered their agreement on stone in the temple of Artemis. Both sides kept the treaty: Artemis was not to be trifled with; this was not 'a scrap of paper'.

There were many such amphictyonies; but the most famous was that of Delphi, founded at the dawn of history by the tribes that were then most powerful. It was mainly owing to this amphictyony that Delphi attained its dominating position among the Greek cities, as 'the common hearth of all Hellas'; the choice of this expression shows that this Hellas was understood as an expanded community, just as the community with its hearth in the prytaneum was an expanded household. The beneficent results of this religious unification for all inter-Hellenic politics were expressed in this treaty also: 'We take an oath not to allow a city belonging to the amphictyony to be destroyed, not to deprive it of drinking water either in war or in peace, and to declare war on a state which may venture to do such a thing'. These promising beginnings unfortunately did not fully produce the fruits that might have been expected of them ; so far as one can judge, this was due to two causes. In the first place, of the states that concluded the treaty, several had completely lost their importance in the historic epoch, and yet in the Amphictyonic Council they all enjoyed their former right of representation along with Athens and Sparta, in consequence of which the Council, as a representative organ, ceased to correspond to the political organization of Greece. And in the second place, Delphi in the sixth and fifth centuries, yielding to the temptations of international politics, was untrue to its significance in Greece as the support of national ideals against the Persians. Had it not been for these two causes, the 'common hearth of Hellas' would have become its great prytaneum under the protection of Zeus of all Hellas and of his powerful son Apollo. In this fashion the future religion of Hellas was outlining itself.

Other centres of the religious unification of the Greeks were their national games, which also had a cult character : the games of Zeus at Nemea and, most important, at Olympia, of Posidon at the Isthmus, of Apollo at Delphi. Here also belong the mysteries of Eleusis, after the date when, by the will of the same Delphian Apollo, they had been recognized as of importance for all Hellas.

Of the common laws of Hellas mentioned above, some, if not all, likewise had a religious sanction. I will mention the two most important.

We already know Hermes and his potent wand—the wand with serpents—the symbol of security among foreigners and enemies. In the hands of his servants, heralds, it protected not only the heralds themselves but persons who accompanied them; and therefore in times of war the office of herald acquired an inter-Hellenic character. The words, ‘Henceforward these two states did not communicate with each other except through heralds’, meant that they were in a state of war. I beg you to notice how Hermes now grows in stature before our very eyes; Hermes, that ‘god of thieves’, as he is conceived by men who mistake playful mythology for religion. No, all that sort of thing one should simply forget as completely as may be. ‘If I ply this herald-craft of Hermes with any sureness, I will never trip in doing thine errand’, says the herald Lichas in Sophocles (Trachiniae, 620, 621 : tr. Jebb). ‘If any herald or ambassador carry a false message to any other city, or bring back a false message from the city to which he is sent, or be proved to have brought back, whether from friends or enemies, in his capacity of herald or ambassador, what they have never said, let him be indicted for having offended, contrary to the law, in the sacred office and appointment of Hermes and Zeus’, says Plato (Laws, 941 A : tr. Jowett). Such are the voices of genuine religion. And there was no trifling with him: when the Argive herald Copreus fell at Athens as a victim of popular 'lynch law', the divinities of Eleusis, who in that city watched over the rights of Hermes, laid a penance upon Athens from which the city was liberated only a thousand years later.

The second of these laws pertained to supplication (hikesia) and hospitality, two kindred institutions, which were united by the common care of Zeus himself. A foreigner, even an enemy, was sacred if with an olive branch in his hand he took refuge at the altar of a god; Zeus Hikesios protected him and defended him from wrong. There were, however, even simpler ceremonies of supplication; as a last resort it sufficed to touch with a supplicating hand a man's hand, knees, or chin, in order to secure for oneself his protection in the name of Zeus. Closely connected with this custom was the right of asylum, which in some measure was associated with all sacred places, but with certain of them to a peculiar degree. Evidently in all cases of this sort there was danger of abuse; the legal feeling of well-ordered communities could not allow a criminal to escape deserved punishment through supplication or asylum. But in any case a foreigner and an enemy, as such, had safety assured him.

A no less effective means of escape was hospitality, which in Greece was observed with special sanctity: 'honour the gods', 'honour thy parents', 'honour a guest', such were the three most important commandments for a Greek. At first only private bonds of hospitality were recognized. These, however, were hereditary : the Achaean Diomedes and Glaucus, an ally of the Trojans, lower their spears before each other and even exchange armour, concluding a sort of brotherhood, as soon as they have recognized each other as ' guest-friends of old times through their fathers ' (Iliad, vi. 215 : tr. Leaf). But more frequently men recognized each other by means of the two halves of a tablet (symbolon), which in old times the fathers or ancestors of the men concerned had broken in half when they concluded their bond of hospitality.

But since the community was an enlarged family and possessed its own hearth, guarded by Hestia, a bond of hospitality was also possible with the community as a whole : thus arose the institution of proxeny, corresponding in some measure to our consulate. For example, Cimon, who was an Athenian, was the proxenos of Sparta at Athens : the meaning of the office was as follows. Whenever Cimon made a trip to Sparta, he was the guest of the state there ; if a Spartan came to Athens, he was the guest of Cimon and enjoyed his protection in all his affairs. Thus under the patronage of Zeus the Hospitable (Zeus Xenios) an inter-Hellenic law made its appearance in hospitable Hellas.

Could even an international law have developed from this? In other words: did Greek religion recognize humanity as well as Hellas? Here we come upon a trait in it which is alone sufficient to give it a higher position than any religion contemporary with it: while Jehovah was still only the tribal god of his 'chosen people' and recognized other nations only as the tools of his rewards or his punishments, the Homeric Zeus was the god of all humanity and looked with equal kindness on the Greek and on the Greek's foe, if the foe deserved it.

Ah—I behold a warrior dear to me

Around the walls of Ilium driven, and grieve—

[Iliad, xxii. 168, 169: tr. COWPER.]

Thus he speaks of Hector, the principal foe of the Achaeans beneath the walls of Troy. I should like to have the reader of this book remember these two verses better than aught else, that they may be the first thing to arise in his consciousness at the mention of the words 'Greek religion'.

This came to pass because the Greek 'was not so spellbound by the magic of the name but that he was capable of the humane and tolerant idea that seemed so hard for the Semitic mind of Israel to grasp—namely, that mankind might worship the same godhead under different names' (Farnell, Ibid. p. 106). We find this idea already clearly expressed in the profound prayer of Aeschylus to Zeus:

O Zeus—whoe'er he be,
 If that name please him well,
 By that on him I call.

[Agamemnon, ed. Weil, 160-162 : tr.
 adapted from PLUMPTRE.]

'The cruellest fanaticism and the most savage religious wars have been stimulated partly by this fallacious sentiment concerning the magic of names. The Greek escaped all this, nor did any religious war in the true sense of the word stain the pages of Greek history; and no unhappy logic compelled him to degrade the deities of other peoples into the rank of devils. If the modern man has arrived at the conception that difference of divine title is of little import, a conception of priceless value for the cause of human unity, he owes it mainly, as Rome owed it, to the mind of Hellas' (Farnell, Ibid. pp. 106, 107).

At first, when Hellenism was confined to the boundaries of its own country, the result of this conception was merely tolerance for the religions of other peoples. Let the reader review the history of Herodotus from this point of view, and he will be convinced that for the Greek there are no 'pagans'. 'The Thracians worship Ares'; 'the Egyptians worship Zeus (Ammon), Demeter (Isis), Athena (Hator)'; 'the Persians worship Apollo'; and so on. It is perfectly clear that all humanity worships the same gods, that all humanity forms a harmonious religious whole. On the basis of this conception Delphi made an attempt to extend its religion to all humanity. In the West it succeeded: Rome of the Tarquins recognized Apollo and under his influence identified the Greek gods with its own, even accepting their ritual to a marked degree; henceforward we have Zeus-Jove and the like. In the East it also had some success at first, in the time of Croesus; but when Croesus, by crossing the Halys, 'destroyed a powerful kingdom'—his own—and Delphi yearned to take under its protection the victorious Persians, it lost thereby a part of its influence in Greece, and yet failed to unite the world under the ensign of the religion of god the father and god the son. For that the 'time must be fulfilled'.

On the other hand, when Alexander the Great removed the barrier between Hellenism and the barbarian East, when his successors with the aid of their Graeco-Macedonian armies became the rulers of oriental kingdoms, then the time came for their religious unification. And we must deeply regret that the sources give us such scanty information of the apostle of Demeter of Eleusis, who was the principal creator of this unification; of Timotheus, the hierophant of Eleusis. So much we know, that—probably in the time of Lysimachus—he accomplished the fusion of the mysteries of Eleusis with the Asiatic cult of the Great Mother of the gods in Pessinus (Cybele), whereby the religion of this Mother became the official religion of the Kingdom of Pergamum ; we know also that this same Timotheus under Ptolemy Soter accomplished the fusion of the mysteries of Eleusis with the cult of Isis in Egypt, whereby the religion of Zeus-Sarapis and of Demeter-Isis became the official religion of the dominions of the Ptolemies. Both cults were later transferred to Greece and to Rome—to that Rome which was already the whole world. And when this Roman world reorganized Christianity, the two cults with their united strength gave to the new religion its goddess. This is not a conjecture ; this is a documented fact. When Gregory the Theologian, gratifying the religious needs of his faithful Christians, permitted them to worship the Mother of God, the fanatics among the Christians murmured, saying : ‘ But this is Isis ! ’—‘ But this is the Great Mother ! ’ They would have been still more correct if they had said : ‘ But this is Demeter, the mother of sorrows, the comforter and consoler of the afflicted ! ’ ph!

VI

THE REVELATION OF GOD IN GOODNESS

‘EVERY man should strive to keep his soul pure and free from evil of every sort, for the gods accept no worship from evil men. They are not served by rich gifts and magnificent offerings, but by virtue and a will directed towards justice and goodness. Therefore every man who wishes to be dear to the gods should be good to the extent of his power, both in act and will. . . . He should remember that the gods exist and that they punish the unjust ; and he should always have in mind the time when he must depart from life. For all men when about to die repent, remembering their unjust acts, and bitterly yearn that they might always have acted justly. . . . And if an evil demon stands beside him, urging him to injustice, then he should seek shelter in the temples, at the altars and in the holy places, fleeing from injustice as a most unholy and grievous mistress, and supplicating the gods to aid him in driving her from him’ (Stobaeus, ed. Hense, vol. iv. pp. 124, 125).

These notable words occurred in the introduction to the code of Zaleucus, the oldest written legislation of Greece. To be sure, somebody else wrote them. Zaleucus lived in the seventh century before Christ, in Locri in Italy; but his code at various dates, and with appropriate alterations, passed to other Grecian states, and during one of these transfers our introduction may have been added. At any rate it belongs to the epoch of which we are speaking. In it, in a clear form, the conviction became crystallized which, with a diffused light, illumines the rest of the literature of that epoch, the conviction that the Greek religion was a religion in the highest degree ethical, that the Greek god revealed himself in goodness.

It was not always so. Primitively both in Greece and everywhere else god revealed himself not in justice, but in power, and the Homeric epoch was an epoch of the gradual fusion of 'god' and 'good' into one concept. And undoubtedly, if Greece, like Israel, had lived under the rule of a powerful priesthood, that priesthood would have carefully obliterated every trace of a primitive pre-moral conception of the deity. Happily this was not the case—the orderly sequence of various layers in the Homeric poems makes it possible for us to observe more or less exactly the curious and important process of the gradual moralization of the Greek religion. At first the god watches exclusively, but extremely jealously, over man's strictly religious duty, that is, his fulfilment of his obligations towards him, the god; later he extends his care to those human relations which, owing to the weakness of one of the parties, may easily tempt the other to abuse his power: such are the relations of sons to their grey-haired parents and of a householder to an unarmed guest. Finally, the entire moral duty of man becomes the object of the divine opis—to use the name given by Homer in the Odyssey to the all-seeing punitive power of the divinity.

After the Homeric epoch came the epoch marked by the prevailing influence of the Delphic Apollo. To it we owe definite progress in the field which we are discussing, mingled at first, to be sure, with certain deviations from the straight path marked out by the evolution of the Homeric epoch. Owing to the primitive significance of Apollo as god of the sun, the postulate of purity (hagneia) became the principal postulate of the religion of Apollo. Hateful to the god is all that defiles man and through man the god himself—all pollution (miasma); the pollution of pollutions was murder; next came adultery, and so on. In this book I cannot sketch the history of the development of the concept of pollution: I take it in its final form.

The danger of the deviation mentioned above depended on the fact that pollution could be understood independently of intention, as 'self-sufficing pollution' ; the shedding of all human blood defiles, even if it be shed involuntarily or in just self-defence ; and the most criminal plan does not defile, if, in consequence of circumstances independent of the planner, it fails to succeed. All contact with a murderer defiles, all conversation with him, and the like, for pollution acts like contagion. Another danger was inherent in the broadening of the concept : the shedding of all blood defiles, even if it be that of a beast ; so do all sexual relations, even in marriage. Great was the temptation of (religious) vegetarianism and that of the worship of an antiphysical virginity ; and indeed here and there we meet with the realization of them : of the first in Pythagoreanism, of the second in a movement of which we find evidence in the Hippolytus of Euripides. Finally, since of course Apollo himself was the god who purified one from pollution, and since purification took place by means of religious rites, therefore there was also great danger of ritualism ; that is, that the rites of purification would be recognized as self-sufficing, independently of the mental attitude of the person subject to them : in other words, to appeal to a medieval analogy, that in the religion of Apollo there would prevail not the point of view of St. Thomas Aquinas, but that of Duns Scotus, and that religious justification would be recognized as possible ex opere operato sine bono motu auctoris, from the act performed without any good intention on the part of the doer.

In the development of the religion of Apollo the seventh and the sixth centuries were an epoch of struggle, which to some degree continued even in the fifth century; this struggle ended with the victory of the moral principle. A main cause of this victory was the Pythagorean school of prophets; upholding vegetarianism (principally from eschatological views, of which we shall speak later), it nevertheless contended energetically and successfully with an external understanding of purity, with self-sufficing pollution and with ritualism. I may cite as an illustration the reply of the prophetess Theano—I must, however, first forewarn the reader that the Greek word anēr, like the German Mann, signifies both man and husband—so when she was presented with the query, an important one for the religious life of woman in the family, how soon ‘after the man’ a woman becomes clean, the prophetess replied: ‘After her own at once, after another never’ (Stobaeus, ed. Hense, iv. 586).

In the Greek tragedy of the fifth century we still perceive traces of the old theory of self-sufficing pollution and of ritualism; in the fourth century the moral point of view conquered. Purifying rites were recognized as having a certain importance, which after all rightly belongs to them, as a powerful means of acting on the feelings and the frame of mind of the believer; but purity of soul was given the first place. This point of view is very beautifully expressed by the epigram of the Delphic priestess:

Pure be thy soul when thou ent'rest the most pure temple of godhead ;
First let the Castalian spring wash all stain from thy limbs.
Good men need but a drop, O pilgrim. But if thou art wicked,
Then the waves of the sea never will banish thy stain.

Returning to the gains by the Homeric epoch, we shall easily detect still another danger, which, however, many men do not regard as a danger at all. God stands on guard over moral obligation in its full extent and punishes offenders against it: should we then be moral in order to avoid punishment? Because of terror?

Of course in the last analysis even this is good—and nobody will deny that the fear of God is a powerful moral stimulus. The religious morality of the Homeric epoch created this very term; it terms godfearing (theoudēs) a man or a people that, for example, behaves kindly towards foreigners. It is easy to understand the matter: the gods dwell on high in the heavens and man sees them not; but when the autumn rains deluge his fields and destroy the grain that he has planted, then he knows that Zeus is inflicting punishment for unjust sentences passed in the market-place. So he fears Zeus.

But then came the times of the religion of Apollo; the gods began to dwell among men, in beautiful temples, themselves beautiful and gracious, in so far as artists succeeded in reproducing their forms in the images that they fashioned; the civil calendar began to glow with the colours of beautiful festivals, celebrated with ever more enchanting ceremonies, which gradually changed the Greek religion into a religion of joy—in the face of this sea of beauty the former terror could not endure. One must fear the Erinyes: so men strove not to mention their name, and passed by the gloomy grotto dedicated to them beneath the crag of the Acropolis only with gentle steps and with a gentle prayer. In general, the word ‘godfearing’ (in its new form deisidaimōn) began to mean superstitious; a man of normal faith did not fear his gods but loved them.

In very truth, now for the first time there came into general use an epithet which the Homeric Greek had not yet ventured to bestow upon his gods, the epithet ‘dear’. In Homeric times men did no more than recognize that a god could love a mortal. ‘Love me to-day, O Athena,’ Diomedes prays before a desperate combat (compare p. 136, below), and ‘the Muse loved more than other men’ the bard Demodocus (Odyssey, viii. 62). But still man had not yet ventured to reply to that love with a return of affection: terror does not permit the rise of a gentler feeling. Now the barrier was removed. 'Dear Zeus', 'dear Apollo', 'dear Artemis', we hear at every step, so frequently that we do not even notice the word. A festival is observed that the hearts of the gods may rejoice; and even a modest song, sung at table in honour of a god, has as its favourite ending: 'Smile upon my song, O god!' So when we hear that a man always consecrates to a god objects which, though they have no inherent worth, have become significant to him at a time when with peculiar clearness he has felt over him the saving arm of a god who loves him—thus a shipwrecked man dedicates to Posidon his wet clothing, obviously far from costly; a prisoner, whom the love of a pirate's daughter has preserved from death, consecrates his chains to Aphrodite; and even women in childbed offer their tunics to Artemis—is it not plain that the same love is at work which among men in similar circumstances gives worth to even the least valuable objects?

And as for children who love their parents there is no more bitter punishment than separation from them, so for a Greek it was a most grievous feeling that, owing to his sins, the gods would not allow him to approach their presence, that he would be forbidden to enter the holy Acropolis, that he would not behold Pallas, goddess of his fathers, that he would not share with others the soul-exalting ceremonies of the public festivals, that he would even be excluded from a sacrifice in the quiet of his home, with its prayer and sprinkling.

Now let me inquire: Where again shall we find a similar foundation for religious ethics, a similar relation of man to God?—In Christianity? Yes, most assuredly. A Pole's most frequent formula of asseveration is, 'As I love God', and the words lieber Gott have become the most usual epithet used by a German. Yet it may not be superfluous to put the question: Which of the two rivers that united in Christianity brought with it that joyous feeling?

When in the Graeco-Roman world there arose the first societies of people who worshipped the God of Israel, they distinguished themselves from others and were themselves distinguished by others by an official title, 'Men who fear God' (phoboumenoi ton theon).

And when the Stoics finished building the structure of autonomic ethics begun by Plato, they needed only to put in place of the divinity their own goddess, virtue, in order to obtain the same distinction between the free soul and the slavish soul:

'Tis love of right that keeps the good from wrong;
You do no harm because you fear the thong.

[HORACE, Epistles, i. 16. 52, 53: tr. CONINGTON.]

The ethical character attained by the religion of ancient Greece in its flourishing epoch is also expressed in the customary methods of worship, which, without reference to the individual features of each festival, are common to all of them, and also to the private cult in its manifold manifestations. For the most part these are gifts (and more particularly sacrifices) offered to the gods, and prayers.

By sacrifices I mean all varieties of them, from the modest incense or libation to which men constantly resorted, thus mingling with every moment of life that was important in itself the warmth of a symbolic communion with the deity, up to the solemn hecatomb. Here religio-ethical progress depended on the fact that the centre of gravity was constantly shifted from the material worth of the sacrifice to the devout temper of the man offering it. Beginnings of the process already existed in very ancient times: as has been said above, among the Greeks even a sacrifice by fire was not a holocaust, but a banquet shared by gods and men, while into the fire were cast those parts of the beast that had small value as food. If the rough-hewn peasant intellect of Hesiod could interpret this custom only by the supposition that Zeus—voluntarily, to be sure—let himself be deceived by Prometheus, the friend of humanity, he himself is responsible for such an explanation, while it is a fact that even in Homeric times true believers understood that the rite which they performed had symbolic and not material value. Under these conditions the hecatombs, both public and private, furnished a generous meal for the poor, to whom they offered the only opportunity for regaling themselves on meat. So the plenteousness of them was dear to the god as an act of kindness in his name. Must we then conclude that a rich man possessed more ample means of winning the favour of the gods than a poor man? Such was the opinion of many men in the fifth century—and the venerable old man Cephalus in Plato's Republic (331 B), when asked what he regards as the best feature of his wealth, replies in that spirit: 'That I depart to the other world without fear, being a debtor neither to the gods nor to men.'

Yet the best minds of Greece struggled with this danger of the materialization of the sacrifice—and struggled successfully. The result of that struggle is expressed for example in the words ascribed to Zaleucus that have been cited above; as time went on the worth of the 'widow's mite' was more and more recognized. To it Horace, the propagator of Hellenic ideas among the Romans, dedicated one of his most beautiful odes, full of the deepest feeling (Odes, iii. 23).

What I have said of sacrifices, as banquets shared by gods and men, pertains to only one class of them—the most frequent, to be sure—the sacrifices of supplication. There were, however, sacrifices of other sorts, of which I shall mention only one class, the most grave and awful, the sacrifices of expiation. They are connected, not with a joyous and confident, but with an oppressed attitude on the part of the sacrificers—oppressed by the undoubted wrath of the god, which no prayers can appease. In such cases men sometimes had recourse to an ancient symbolic rite; they selected a beast which was to be the 'scapegoat', bade it bear the sin and the pollution of the whole people, and consecrated it to the wrathful gods, sometimes by burning it entire (holokauston), sometimes by burying it or casting it into the sea. This is a remarkable idea, which passed into the most mysterious sacrament of the Christian religion—Agnus Dei qui tollit peccata mundi, 'The Lamb of God that taketh away the sins of the world'. And from the idea in both cases there develops a terrible rite—'It is expedient for you that one man should die for the people, and that the whole nation perish not' (John xi. 50)—the rite of an expiatory human sacrifice.

It was universal both in the east and in the west, in the north and in the south; once on a time even Hellas practised it—we are all familiar with the sacrifice of Iphigenia; and the beautiful legend of Jephthah's daughter has an almost exact parallel in the Greek legend of Idomeneus, King of Crete, who also once thoughtlessly vowed that he would offer in sacrifice to the gods whatever should come forth to meet him—and unexpectedly he met his own son. But the Cretans banished Idomeneus owing to his godless sacrifice; and Artemis did not accept the blood of Iphigenia from Agamemnon, but at the critical moment substituted for her a doe.

In the historical epoch the healthy feeling of Greece contends victoriously with this terrible survival. Here a man is replaced by a sacrificial animal, disguised as a man; there, by a doll. Here the man remains a man, but his sacrifice is replaced by the sprinkling of the altar with his blood, or else he is thrown from a crag, after due care has been taken that he escape without injury. Finally, in other places, and very rarely—and this was the most scrupulous attitude towards ancient traditions—a criminal condemned to death was designated as a sacrifice. In each case we have to deal with so-called pharmakoi, or means of 'healing' the land from illness. And in all these transformations, not excluding the last, there is expressed a consciousness that a human sacrifice cannot be reconciled with the religio-moral feeling of historic Greece. From this same point of view Euripides protests against the horrible ritual of the barbaric Artemis of the Taurians :

Rather I suspect that the natives of this land, being cannibals themselves, impute this failing to their deity; for I cannot believe that any god is such a sinner.

[Iphigenia among the Taurians, 389-391 :
tr. COLERIDGE.]

Turning to prayer, we can observe here also the same progress in a moral direction. A Greek prayer is usually composed of three parts : the invocation, the entreaty, and the sanction. Let us take as an example one of the oldest and the most beautiful, the prayer to Apollo of his priest Chryses, whose daughter the Achaeans have given to Agamemnon as a paramour :

God of the silver bow, who with thy power Encirclest Chryse, and who reign'st supreme
In Tenedos and Cilla the divine, Sminthian Apollo !

This is the invocation (theologia) : the man praying heaps up epithets, judging that it is pleasant to the god to hear of his own power and dignities, and not wishing, so far as he is able, to omit a single one of the sides of the activity of the god whom he is invoking.

If I e'er adorned
Thy beauteous fane, or on thy altar burned
The fat acceptable of bulls or goats—

This is the sanction : the man praying appeals to the services which he himself has rendered to the god, in order that he may thereby incline him to hearken to his prayer.

Grant my petition. With thy shafts avenge
On the Achaean host thy servant's tears.

[Iliad, i. 37-42 : tr. COWPER.]

This is the entreaty (euchē)—in the present case an entreaty for vengeance, for punishment :

in substance the prayer amounts to a curse.
' And Apollo heard the prayer.'

In all three parts of the prayer progress was possible and was attained.

The noisy verbosity of the invocation was at bottom innocent, and therefore was long preserved; and yet we feel the growth of an ethical power in the invocation by Aeschylus that has already been mentioned:

O Zeus—whoe'er he be,
If that name please him well,
By that on him I call.

[See pp. 77, 119.]

More important was the sanction. In the prayer of Chryses, despite all its beauty, it nevertheless amounts to pointing out to the god his duty. Yes, his duty; and therefore the later prayer of Diomedes to Pallas, which I have also already mentioned (p. 128), stands higher from a moral point of view: the hero does not appeal to his own merits, but, on the contrary, to the love which the goddess has already frequently shown him:

Unconquered daughter of Zeus, Aegis-armed!
If ever me, propitious, or my sire
Thou hast in furious fight helped heretofore,
Now show thy love for me.

[Iliad, v. 115-117: tr. adapted from COWPER.]

And on the same basis rests the prayer of Sappho to Aphrodite, one of the most heartfelt and the most moving that have been preserved to us. We have before us a loving woman, whose affection has been spurned by her beloved. . . .

May a Christian woman in prayer give free expression to feelings of the same earthly sort ? I think that the Mother of God accepts even such prayers, if they are sincere and if the feeling of injury that has called them forth is likewise sincere. But at all events Aphrodite accepted them :

Come in thy pity—come, if I have prayed thee ;
 Come at the cry of my sorrow : in the old times
 Oft thou hast heard, and left thy father's heaven,
 Left the gold houses.

[Tr. EDWIN ARNOLD.]

Once on a time men were certainly familiar with still another sanction : man appealed to his own power over the divinity, which he had gained by magic means ; he did not ask, but demanded and threatened ; the prayer was a conjuratio. Such was at all times the attitude of the Egyptians to their gods ; but for the Greek this is a hypothetical oldest epoch of superstition, of which even in the Homeric epoch, not to speak of the historical, there remained no trace whatever—if we leave out of account certain low fields of private magic.

Finally—the entreaty.—For what is it proper to ask ? Obviously the desire for retribution is a natural feeling, especially if great wrong has been done to some one ; and Plato himself admits that the curse of a father or mother, to whom his children have done wrong, will infallibly reach the ears of the gods. From this point of view one can also understand that even the State, the common mother of all citizens, at times invokes the punishment of the gods against her evil sons who by flight have escaped the punishment of public justice. And yet—what nobility breathes from the reply of Theano, the priestess of Demeter! When the Athenian democracy, enraged at the treachery of Alcibiades, addressed all the priests and priestesses with a demand that they cast on him a curse in the name of their gods, she alone did not comply with the demand, but replied: 'I am the priestess of prayers and not of curses' (Plutarch, Alcibiades).

God is goodness and only good proceeds from him, taught Plato; and therefore it is proper to ask him only for what is good. Great was the temptation to understand this good in a low sense and to address the gods with such prayers as, in the ironic phrase of the later Stoic Persius, could be communicated to them only if one took them aside. In order to counteract this low conception, old Pythagoras had already demanded that every prayer should be spoken aloud. The states in their official prayers set a good example in this respect: Athens prayed 'for the good and the unity of Athenian citizens, their wives and children, and the whole country; and likewise for those of the allies'; Sparta, that the gods should give her 'beauty along with the good'. But highest of all, obviously, was the prayer which Plato, or his school, puts into the mouth of Socrates: 'Lord Zeus, grant us good even without our request; grant us not evil, even at our request' (Alcibiades II. 143A).

Yet one may ask whether such a conception of prayer be not a negation of it. 'No,' answered Neoplatonism, 'for prayer exalts the soul to immediate communion with the deity.' (Compare Proclus, In Timaeum, 64A.) In this way was attained the highest point in the religious-moral conception of prayer.

Hitherto we have been speaking of religion for good men; but the nation contains also evil men, and many of them too. Then let the thought of divine punishment restrain them from crime, if they have no feeling for communion in love.

Of divine punishment, but where? In this world or in the next? Zaleucus speaks of both; we too shall speak of both.

God in this world rewards the good and punishes the evil. What does that mean? It means that the prosperity of the good and the misfortunes of the evil, independently of the natural causes that have produced them, are understood as the reward or punishment sent by the deity. For all acts and experiences of man are connected with one another by a double causality, natural and supernatural, and these causalities do not mutually exclude each other, but exist side by side : such is the ' law of double vision ' which I have established, something analogous to the ' psycho-physical parallelism ' recognized by some modern philosophers.

Excellent : so long as the good man is happy and the bad man unhappy, all is in order. Yet the reverse occurs—experience is inexorable—and frequently at that. Where then is the divine opis, or, as later men will say, divine providence (pronoia, Latin providentia) ? Herein there is a barrier, but it is not hard to overcome it. Triumph not, O criminal ; lose not hope, O just man ; await what will occur later : ' The mills of the gods grind slowly, but they grind exceeding small.'

Very good, we will wait. . . . And now we have waited, until death. The criminal has died in prosperity, the just man in misfortune. Where are ye now, ye mills of the gods ?

This is the stumbling-block. The author of the Book of Job, even before reaching it, was cast down in spirit and found salvation from despair only in the mist of agnosticism. The Greek was happily borne over the abyss of despair by faith in Mother Earth and her laws. Here we come to a view important in ancient ethics, in distinction from modern ethics, which I have called phylonomism, contrasting it to the ontonomism of the present day—the terms are selected by analogy with the phylogenesis and ontogenesis of Haeckel.

So we have waited until death—and we have paused, thinking that it is—I repeat, in this world—the end. And here we have made a mistake; death is not the end. Beyond or above its boundaries the life of the individual endures further—in the species.

‘That is a truism.’ So far it really is one; and obviously phylonomism does not depend on this statement. It depends on the fact that the individual is conscious that he forms a single whole with his species in an ascending and descending line; that he is conscious of a load of responsibility laid on him by his ancestors, and at the same time of another, which he is laying on his posterity. Phylonomism is a phenomenon of consciousness and not of natural history.

In most recent times the growth of science, with a brutality that we have merited by our apostasy, has placed us face to face with this truth that we had forgotten, and is building up before us the terrible problem of heredity. Yes, by our physical nature we verily gather fruits sown by our ancestors and answer for their sins—without any merit or fault on our own part. . . . Our own? Ridiculous reservation! Are they not ourselves?

The Greek long ago anticipated this problem and settled it on the basis of his phylonomic consciousness. . . . The humblest farm servant was then an aristocrat, compared with whom the most royal of the kings of to-day in his ontonomic poverty betrays himself as a plebeian. The species not only is immortal, but feels itself so in every individual of it.

The descendant must answer for the sins of his ancestors—that is just as natural as the fact that an old man must answer for the sins of his youth. If a man is overtaken by a misfortune which he has not deserved by anything in his life as an individual, his first thought is that he is paying a penance for the sin of some one of his ancestors :

On mine head have I gathered the load
Of the far-off sins of an ancient line ;
And this is the vengeance of God !

[EURIPIDES, Hippolytus, 831-833 :

tr. WAY.]

Thus exclaims the Theseus of Euripides at the news of the sudden death of his young wife Phaedra. The religious ethics of the 'tragic epoch' of Greece personified this hereditary sin under the name Alastor ; an important part of Greek tragedy, especially in the trilogies of Aeschylus, is built on this belief. Whether that conception had penetrated the deep layers of popular belief we do not know, but that is not the point at issue. 'From the gods a perjurer cannot find concealment, nor can he escape their punishment ; and if not he himself, then the children and all the race of the perjurer encounter great disaster': such are the words, even at the end of the fourth century (compare below, p. 181), of the spiritual leader of Athens at that time, the magistrate and orator Lycurgus (Against Leocrates, 79).

In this manner faith in divine providence was preserved. Does the good man die in misfortune? Let him comfort himself, contemplating his posterity: his good deeds will shelter them with the warm cloak of divine grace, under which life will be good for them.—Does the evil man die in prosperity? Let him tremble at the thought of Alastor, whom he has introduced into his house by his crimes, giving it over to him to be consumed and condemning his own posterity to disasters and destruction.—And if both of them are childless? Then both of them are already punished, the good man for the crimes of his ancestors, the evil man for his own—and, moreover, their punishment is as terrible as the punishing hand of the deity can inflict upon them.

In very truth, one conviction lies at the basis of ancient phylonomism and of the general ancient view of the world: 'Children are a blessing, childlessness is a misfortune.' Euripides gives expression to the idea: 'Ah! yes, his children are to every man as his own soul; and whoso sneers at this through inexperience, though he suffers less anguish, yet tastes the bitter in his cup of bliss ' (Andromache, 418-420 : tr. Coleridge).

Here meet the threads that proceed from ancient religion : from one side, as a religion of nature ; from the other, as a religion of society—the physical thread and the political thread. And here we note the force of the words, full of deep meaning, that accompanied the sacrament of marriage : ' I have fled from evil, I have found good ' (see p. 96, above).

In this world—that is one side of the question, for many men the principal consideration, but yet it is not the whole thing : the teachings of Zaleucus speak also of punishment in the other world. This need not surprise us : the Christian view is more or less the same. Yet there is a difference in the degree of certainty felt by man on these two subjects.

Curious in this respect are the words of Cephalus, the representative of the religious morality of the average Greek, whom I have mentioned above (p. 132) : ' When a man thinks himself to be near death, fears and cares enter into his mind which he never had before ; the tales of a world below and the punishment which is enacted there of deeds done here, were once a laughing matter to him, but now he is tormented with the thought that they may be true ' (Plato, Republic, 330 D : tr. Jowett).

As a matter of fact, there was no dogmatic clearness on this topic ; various views coexisted, the fruits of the religious consciousness of various epochs. The soul lives after the death of the body, so much is fully recognized : but how ? It abides invisibly, as a kindly ghost, in the house of its descendants ; or it dwells near the body in the tomb, where also one should care for it, but it visits its own former house at the festival of the Anthesteria, or, along with other souls, it dwells in the common realm of all the shades, in the precincts of Hades, which are sometimes imagined as being at the western borders of the earth, beyond Oceanus, and sometimes beneath the earth. In all this there is as yet no moral element ; we are dealing with a side of ancient religion called animism.

Nor is there any directly moral element in a phenomenon, characteristic of Greece, on which I have already touched from time to time—in heroization. The hero in a formally religious sense is a glorified mortal. He possesses full consciousness (pampsychos) ; as transfigured, he is clad in the highest beauty (eumorphos) ; he is happy in his power and in the worship that he receives (makarios). He is united with the living by a bond of love ; his memory is honoured by them in the second of the three libations at banquets : the new Attic comedy frequently represented him as the guardian spirit of the house faithful to him, as the defender from wrong of orphans left without a guardian. But for what reason was the honour of heroization granted to a mortal? Not always for the moral deserts of his life.

Yet there existed a teaching which opened wide the gates of eschatology to the stream of morality; this teaching, however, was secret, was for the initiated. I refer to the mysteriæ (from the verb myein, 'to close the eyes'; the initiate must sever himself from the external world for the purpose of internal contemplation). Of such mysteries there were several varieties in Greece; but I shall limit myself to the two principal types, the Eleusinian mysteries of Demeter and the Orphic mysteries of Dionysus.

The Eleusinian mysteries, connected with the Attic city of Eleusis on the Saronic gulf, were at bottom mysteries of the reviving grain: as the grain perishes when cast into a furrow of the earth, but after dwelling a certain time under its covering, rises again, so rises again the soul of a man buried in the bosom of the earth. This teaching found expression in a myth: Cora, the daughter of Demeter, was carried away by the ruler of the underworld; her mother, after long and painful wanderings, discovered the place of her abode and gained thus much, that for a certain time she received back her daughter, who thereafter spent a third part of the year with her husband, and two-thirds with her mother. She gained this by mother's love; love and the desire for a new union with those who had departed rather than, as is supposed, the egoism of an individual attached to life, were in ancient religion the source of inspiration for those who preached the doctrine of the immortality of the soul. Cora, as a result of her being carried away, learned the secrets of the underworld; having learned them, she revealed them to her mother. Demeter and Cora know in what manner a man may secure himself 'a better fate' in the other world; and, since they love men, they have consented to impart their knowledge to them also.

With this aim they founded their mysteries in the same city of Eleusis where for the first time ears of grain had rustled on the fields, thanks to an earlier act of benevolence that Demeter had shown to humanity. Ever since then the initiated have met at that spot—from Eleusis, from Attica, from all Hellas; men and women, rich and poor, freemen and slaves—in the presence of the goddess all are equal. At the festival of the Eleusinia, originally a festival of sowing, they gather together, worship the goddesses with dances and songs by night on their bright meadow by the sea, in order that later in the temple of the mysteries (telestērion) they may obtain the honour of beholding a sacred drama, which awakens in the spectators a certainty of the immortality of the soul and of its 'better fate' in the other world. It will not wander as a powerless and half-conscious shade in the misty abysses of Hades—it will enter green groves, over which cool breezes play and on which shines the sun of our nights, it will circle in an eternal choreia of transformed souls and will breathe in happiness with its whole being.

But the condition of that happiness must be initiation: the voice of the herald summoned to Eleusis in autumn only those who had previously been initiated into the ‘lesser mysteries’ in the spring. From this point of view one may put the question whether the Eleusinian mysteries had also a moral significance. The cynic and mocker Diogenes denied this. “‘What then!’” said he, “shall the condition of Pataecion, the notorious robber, after death be better than that of Epaminondas, merely for his being initiated in these mysteries?’” (Plutarch, How a Young Man ought to hear Poems: tr. Goodwin). This is just as if some fanatic Catholic should maintain: ‘The robber Fra Diavolo, who was christened, and who partook of communion before his execution, will behold from the heights of paradise how the unchristened Socrates is tortured in the flames of Gehenna.’ One may maintain that view as a last resort, yet St. Augustine understood the matter otherwise.

Diogenes of Sinope had not been initiated himself and did not know the Eleusinian teaching, but Aristophanes of Athens knew it. He did not dare to make it public; but yet he ventured, in one of his comedies, to put into the mouths of his chorus—a chorus of persons initiated into the Eleusinian mysteries—the following song in the other world :

O happy, mystic chorus,
 The blessed sunshine o'er us
 On us alone is smiling,
 In its soft sweet light :
 On us who strove for ever
 With holy, pure endeavour,
 Alike by friend and stranger
 To guide our steps aright.

[Frogs, 454-459 : tr. ROGERS.]

These words leave us no room for doubt. No, the condition for gaining happiness in the paradise of Demeter was not single, but twofold. Initiation was the formal religious condition, as is baptism for a Christian. But besides this there was a further, moral condition—a life passed in righteousness. To those initiated at Eleusis the Hierophant made a 'proclamation' (prorrhēsis); in it he excluded from the sacred choreia all those who, though initiated, had nevertheless drawn on themselves the wrath of the goddesses by their sinful life—these then did not share in the holy ceremonies; or even if they shared in them, they did so to their own spiritual destruction. After death neither trial nor special punishments were necessary; the uninitiated throng lived without sufferings to be sure, but lived the life of pale phantoms in the jaws of Hades; and only the good, stamped with the seal of Eleusis, did the queen of the world beyond the grave take by the hand and lead into a land where began for them the Hellenic happiness—an eternal choreia on a flowery meadow, accompanied by the murmur of a gentle breeze, playing amid the rustling leaves of the poplars.

At the opening of the historic life of Greece a new cult, glaringly opposed to its constant feeling for measure and limitation, penetrated into it from the land of unruly forces and raging passions, from Thrace—the cult of Dionysus. In its origin it was most probably a means of influencing by magic the fertility of the earth; and in a society marked by unbridled barbarism, sexual indulgence, as a sympathetic means, awakening the earth to fertility, was not foreign to it; but when it passed over to the soil of orderly Hellas this element must needs fall away: there remained, as the characteristic trait of the new mysteries, ecstasy (ekstasis, literally 'a stepping out of oneself'), access to which was gained through the deafening music of tympana (that is, tambourines), cymbals, and flutes (that is, clarinets), and above all, through the bewildering 'orgiastic' dance. Women were peculiarly subject to the magic of ecstasy; hence the train of the new god was mainly composed of Bacchantes: in their 'nebrides' (that is, fawn-skins), girt with living serpents, with thyrsi in their hands and wreaths of ivy on their loosened hair, they have remained for all time as the symbol of the beautiful savagery that sleeps in the depths of the human soul, but is beautiful only because Hellas gave beauty to it.

In the ecstasy of the dance the soul really 'stepped out' of the bounds of the corporeal life, was transformed, learned the bliss of existence outside the body, fused with wholeness and with nature; on the basis of his own unerring experience man became convinced of the independent existence of his soul, of the possibility for it of a life independent of the body, and therefore of its immortality: such was the eschatological meaning of the religion of Dionysus. It conquered all Greece in the eighth and seventh centuries in the whirl of an ecstatic dance.

Erwin Rohde, the best investigator of this phenomenon, convincingly compares it to the 'mania for dancing' (Tanzwut) that prevailed in central Europe after the great plague of the thirteenth century. Of course the religion of Apollo, which everywhere introduced moderation, strove to do away with the excesses of the new cult: the 'orgies' of Dionysus were confined to certain limits of time and place; they could be held only on Parnassus and, furthermore, only once in two years (at the so-called 'trioterides'). In the rest of Greece the religion of Dionysus was modified so as to agree with the calm forms of the public cult. The festivals of Dionysus, as we have seen, were brought into connection with the work of wine-making—and traces of the ancient ecstasy were preserved only in masquerade games, and in the theatre of Dionysus, where it was transformed by poetry.

This repression of the primitive religion of Dionysus apparently occasioned a new wave of it, which also came from Thrace, and which was joined to the name of Orpheus, the prophet of Dionysus. This wave also came under the pacifying influence of the religion of Apollo: the result of this influence was the Orphic mysteries, which were composed of three parts, cosmogonic, moral, and eschatological.

The cosmogonic part of the Orphic teaching rested on an ancient myth that related how Zeus conquered the Titans (compare p. 159 below) and founded by violence the kingdom of the gods. In order that he might transfer it from hands defiled by violence into pure hands, Zeus made a mother of Persephone, the queen of the depths below the earth; and she bore to him (the first) Dionysus-Zagreus. The Titans enticed to themselves the little Dionysus by the temptation of a reflection in their mirrors; and, after enticing him, tore him into bits and devoured him. Pallas saved the heart and brought it to Zeus; he, after swallowing it, espoused Semele, the daughter of Cadmus, and she bore to him (a second)

Κοσμογονία

Dionysus. And from the Titans arose the human race.

With this cosmogonic part, in which primitive Thracian savagery was so marvellously transformed by profound Greek symbolism, is joined a moral part. If we spring from the Titans, who devoured the first Dionysus, then our spiritual nature must be composed of two elements, the Titanic and the Dionysiac. The first draws us to corporality, to individuation, to all that is earthly and low; the second, on the contrary, to spirituality, to a new union in Dionysus, to all that is heavenly and lofty. Our moral duty is to suppress Titanism within us and to strive for the liberation of the spark of Dionysus that smoulders there. A means to this end was the 'Orphic life' revealed to those initiated in the Orphic mysteries. One of its duties was to refrain from animal food; this idea arose under the influence of a belief of which I shall speak in a moment.

In the nature of things, an eschatological teaching grows out of the moral teaching. The living Dionysus, the heart of Zagreus, desires a new union with all the parts of his scattered body. Therefore the aim of every man's life should be finally to set free that part of the god which lives within him, and to give it comfort in the great being of the restored Dionysus. But the road to this is very difficult. Titanism is our constant hindrance, tempting us to new mark

εὐκὸς τολογία

individuation and new incorporation. And so we are born and we die, and anew we are born, ever again and again do we enclose our soul in 'the grave of the body' (sōma—sēma), ever again and again do we incorporate ourselves—among other ways even in the bodies of beasts (this is the reason why Orpheus bids us abstain from animal foods)—and there is no end to the tormenting 'circle of births' until we hear at last the voice of Orpheus and return to the 'Orphic life'. Even then we shall not at once be saved. Thrice must we live through a blameless life both here, on earth, and there, in the kingdom of Persephone, until there shall arise for us at last the dawn of liberation, of new union, and of comfort.

The stay in the kingdom of Persephone before a new incarnation is understood as a time of purification from the sins of life; her precincts are for the greater part of mankind a purgatory. But whoever has lived his life on earth without sin, will enjoy happiness in that world also, in a temporal paradise—until the voice of necessity calls him back to earth for new trials. There are, however, men who have defiled themselves by 'incurable' crimes: for them there is no purification; they are condemned to eternal punishment in hell. Therefore a judgment beyond the grave awaits every soul after death: stern and incorruptible judges must decide which of the three realms shall be the place of its abode.

judgment

The Orphic mysteries, in distinction from those of Eleusis, were not connected with any city: everywhere in Greece, especially among the Greek colonies in the west, there arose societies of Orphics, who lived and celebrated their festivals under the guidance of their masters. It is apparent that the purity and the spiritual level of the teaching depended on the personal qualities of these last; and even if, from this point of view, the majority of the 'Orpheotelestae', who terrified the people by the horrors of tortures beyond the grave, occasionally aroused the mockery of enlightened men, on the other hand, earnest preachers of this doctrine found it possible to raise it to such a height that not only poets like Pindar, but even philosophers were subject to its charm. The great Pythagoras made Orphism the fundamental teaching of his order, a genuine masonry, which in the sixth century had its principal lodge in Croton, and from the fifth century to about the second, in Tarentum. Both through the Pythagoreans and independently of them, Plato also was subject to the influence of Orphism: to be sure, in the specifically dogmatic part of his teaching he makes no concessions to Orphism, but in those fantastic myths with which he has adorned his Gorgias, his Phaedo, and especially the last book of his Republic, he shows to a very high degree the influence of the Orphic eschatology. This influence did not end with Plato: partly by the broad river of his philosophy, but still more by underground streams, which we are partially discovering only at the present day, the Orphic eschatology penetrated even into Christianity. The Church sometimes strove to place in its way the dam of the Gospel, then again let it proceed unchecked, considering that certain features of it (for instance, the doctrine of purgatory) were not at variance with its own teachings, and might even be recommended by the Church. At all events Orphism to a notable degree diversified and enlivened Christian conceptions of the world beyond the grave: without Orpheus there would have been no Dante.

Οὐρανολογία
 ἢ Θεολογία ἢ Πιστολογία

VII

RELIGIOUS PHILOSOPHY

A LEARNED philologist and student of Greek religion, G. F. Schömann, in his Griechische Alterthümer (ed. 4 : vol. ii. p. 164), after citing the introduction to the code of Zaleucus that I have quoted above (p. 122), continues as follows : ' So much the more must it amaze us that neither to Zaleucus nor to Solon nor to any other ancient lawgiver did the idea occur, nor did any one of them deem it possible to provide, that by appropriate institutions, connected with the cult, the people should be instructed truthfully and properly, and a genuine fear of God spread among them '. I give an exact translation of these words, since they show in clear-cut relief how narrow is the Christian, and in particular the Protestant, point of view, how helpless it is in the presence of so all-embracing a religion as that of Greece. I hope that to the reader who has followed attentively the course of my reasoning, these words will seem just as strange as to the author of this book. To imagine that a Greek of the epoch of Plato, who derived an immediate revelation of the deity from the contemplation of the Zeus of Phidias, and from taking part in the rites of the Eleusinian festival, which had instructed him in a spirit of true—not fear of God, to be sure, but love of God—to imagine that this Greek needed further private lessons in religion and something in the nature of Luther's Short Catechism !

Schömann, as a Protestant, would obviously reply that image and rite are but a parable, while God can be truly revealed only by words. And when, as a Protestant, he affirmed this, he would err ; for when one speaks of God, the word is just as much a parable as are the image and the rite, only that it is far weaker in its effect. The Greek was not only an intellectualist, but the father of our intellectualism ; and yet he understood that religion is a matter not of intellect but of feeling ; he understood something which after the lapse of many ages his best pupil, Goethe, was to speak forth, in the immortal words of his Faust. Image and rite are the most potent guides of religious feeling ; therefore I have striven to emphasize them properly in this treatment of Greek religion. But after giving them sufficient space within the bounds of this modest volume, I now pass to the third parable, that of the word.

The need of clothing the fullness of religious feeling in an imperfect garment of words made its appearance early in Greece—long before

Homer. Feeling himself primarily under the rule of a religion of nature, man noticed the life of nature, full of storms, which could be understood either as a struggle or as a development. Light struggles with darkness, warmth struggles with cold—yes, but to an equal degree the day emerges from the night, the summer emerges from the winter. These two conceptions offered man the two fundamental parables of his later mythology: the parable of struggle, and hence of discord; and the parable of birth, and hence of the union of the sexes. Uranus (Heaven), by fructifying Earth, begets the Titans and the Titanids, the representatives of the unbridled forces of nature. Earth, bending beneath the weight of her own fruits, implores the aid of Cronus, the youngest of the Titans; and at her request he deprives his father of generative power. Later, uniting with the Titanid Rhea (a second hypostasis of that same Earth), Cronus himself begets a powerful generation of gods; foreseeing that this generation will be his destruction, he swallows his own children; but Rhea saves one of them, Zeus. Zeus in the struggles of the worlds conquers Cronus and the Titans, and, casting them down into Tartarus, founds his own kingdom, in which we are living. To be sure, retribution awaits him also, and a son will be born to him who will be more powerful than he; Zeus himself is fated to meet defeat in a struggle with the regenerated forces of Earth, the Giants. We have already seen (p. 152) how the cosmogony of Orphism rests on this cosmogony. The religion of Apollo took a different attitude with regard to it, proclaiming the reconciliation of Earth to Zeus and the eternity of the kingdom of Zeus, and doing away with the nightmare of the 'gigantomachia'—yet not completely: the ancient dread slumbered on in the impressionable souls of the people—and even in the first century after Christ, when the cloud that overwhelmed Pompeii arose from Vesuvius, the Greeks of the Neapolitan land clearly distinguished in its fantastic outlines the monstrous forms of the Titans, who were returning from Tartarus through the jaws of the fiery mountain, in order to devour the kingdom of gods and men.

This 'theogony', the strange product of dim antiquity, was preserved to historic times in the poem of Hesiod. What was to be done with it? Long before that time men had become convinced of the revelation of God in goodness, and there was precious little goodness in this mythology of struggles between son and father and sexual unions of brother and sister. . . . What was to be done? The same thing that was done with the ancient statues made by Daedalus, when the Zeus of Phidias was already in existence: while revering the imperfect revelations of a dusky past, to nourish one's soul on the more perfect revelations of more recent times.—Yes, but they were injurious : Aristophanes in his Clouds has shown clearly how the Sophists took advantage of them in order to overthrow the very idea of justice :

Wrong Logic. If Justice be there,
How comes it that Zeus could his father reduce,
Yet live with their godships unpunished and loose ?

But was there anything of which the Sophists did not take advantage ! And in Aristophanes the opponent of the speaker makes the only proper reply to him, pointing out the nauseating character of his reasoning :

Right Logic. Ugh ! Ugh ! These evils come thick,
I feel awfully sick :
A basin, quick, quick !

[Clouds, 904-907 : tr. ROGERS.]

Yet the point is that neither the Theogony of Hesiod nor any other ancient book was canonical. We possess religious feeling : what it does not hesitate to accept is true, the rest is non-existent for us.

To be sure, even in the epoch of Socrates, there were men who interpreted in their own fashion the ancient myths of the conflicts among the gods and were of the opinion that in this interpretation they might be accepted. Plato introduces us to such a theologian in the person of Euthyphro, a very peculiar man and in his own way a deep thinker. To him Socrates replies : ' May not this be the reason, Euthyphro, why

I am charged with impiety—that I cannot away with these stories [of discord and violence] about the gods? ’ (Euthyphro, 6 A: tr. Jowett.)

This reply was made under the impression of the accusation which caused the death of the Athenian sage, and therefore it breathes forth a bitterness which Athens did not deserve; in the most anxious times of the Peloponnesian War Euripides had expressed with impunity the same thought through the lips of his Heracles:

I deem not that the gods for spousals crave
 Unhallowed: tales of gods’ hands manacled
 Ever I scorned, nor ever will believe,
 Nor that one god is born another’s lord.
 For god hath need, if god indeed he be,
 Of naught: these be the minstrels’ sorry tales.

[Heracles, 1341-46: tr. WAY.]

But let us leave the Daedali of the revelation in the word and come to its masters, men of the same rank as Phidias and Praxiteles. By concentrating our attention on the Athens of the fourth and third centuries, we may free ourselves from the necessity of following the history of Greek religious philosophy through the doctrines of the Ionians, the Eleatics, Empedocles, and the Sophists: they survived at that period only in so far as they were regenerated in Plato and others. If we have made an exception for the oldest theogony, it is only because that maintained itself on the surface, living in the poems of Homer and, above all, in those of Hesiod.

In accordance with what has been said above, we shall have to deal with the parable of Plato, Aristotle, the Stoa, and Epicurus, with the symbolic utterance of the unutterable. All these sages work with the chisel of their logos, striving for such perfection as is possible for them; they are all justified by the honesty of their intellectual toil. In this honesty one element is their consciousness of the limits of their own logos, a consciousness of the fundamental unprovability of what they say, and their consequent tolerance. And this tolerance doubly justifies them.

One thing more I must point out at the outset. Our own religious scholasticism long ago established, and termed fundamental, a division of religions into monotheistic religions and polytheistic religions, and applied the adjective imperfect to the latter, in comparison with the former: this in turn has given it the right to place even the religion of Islam in a higher position than that of Pericles, Sophocles, and their fellow Athenians—that is, to reach an absurd conclusion. A reader who has become imbued with this notion is usually much surprised when he sees that the Greek writers whom I have mentioned above do not once put the question of monotheism and polytheism. That question had long ago been crossed off the slate by Greek religion. How many Muses are there: one or many? How many Graces (Charites)?

How many Erinyes? Better yet: at Olympia a system of twelve deities was recognized; one altar was consecrated to Zeus and Posidon, one to Hera and Athena, and so on—and finally, one to Dionysus and the Charites. ‘Therefore,’ Schömann informs us (vol. ii. p. 142), ‘since there were several of these last, the number twelve was in point of fact exceeded’. This actually amounts to saying that the Greeks did not know how to count.

In reality, however, they felt to perfection that in the domain of divinity unity is fused with plurality, and this feeling makes their religious consciousness not lower but higher than our scholasticism. In the domain of discursive reasoning the school of the Eleatics worked out the problem: it came to the conclusion that unity exists, but as something ineffable, something bereft of all active energy; it becomes active only after passing through the prism of plurality. For a thinking man, therefore, the question whether the Greek religion was monotheistic or polytheistic ceases to exist.

That religion was both monotheistic and polytheistic also in the philosophy of Plato, who bound together god or the gods with humanity in so firm a union on the basis of his lofty doctrine of the ‘ideas’. To be sure, he did not at once reach those summits of metaphysics. He is very sensitive to the beauty of the visible world, to the immortality of the species living in it; his Eros is a divine force, uniting in ecstasy individuals of different sexes for the purpose of the continuance of the species : ' Love is the desire for birth in beauty in order to gain immortality ' (Symposium, 206 E). Thus does he understand the prophetess Diotima's deep doctrine of love. Yet he has a feeling for a beauty higher than the beauty of the visible world, he soars above that world on the wings of Orphism—and here the body seems to him as but the prison of the soul, and death as its liberation. The true habitation of the soul is the domain of Hades ; here it will gain a fullness of the forces that are weakened by the lusts of the body, a swiftness of sight that is dimmed by corporality. . . .

No, not the domain of Hades, but the expanse above the heavens. Here in radiant immobility abide the perfect models of that which only seemed to us perfect on earth ; here abide the eternal ' ideas,' the contemplation of which is the true food of immortality both for the gods and for the soul. The gods, thanks to the perfection of their nature, enjoy it without hindrance, and so they are immortal by nature. But our souls are chariots, each of which is harnessed to two steeds, the steed of the strong will and the steed of sensual lust, and is guided by the charioteer of reason. And when, accompanying the journey of the gods through the realm of the ideas, above the heavens, souls strive to devote themselves to their contemplation, in order that they too may enjoy the food of immortality, the steed of sensual lust obstinately draws them downward into the domain of the mist beneath the heavens, and for many souls it becomes the cause of downfall.

So they abide upon earth, locked in the prison of their bodies : yet they have brought with them a remembrance of what they beheld in the realm of the ideas above the heavens—except for those unhappy and ruined souls which, owing to the uncontrolled violence with which the steeds of sensuality drew them to earth, could observe nothing. They are fettered by longing for the paradise that they have seen and lost. This longing is peculiarly strong when on earth they encounter the reflection of a heavenly idea ; but, swaddled with the wrappings of the body, it is only through the senses that they can recognize those earthly reflections. And since of all the senses the sense of sight acts most effectively on us, therefore we are filled with the greatest ardour by the visual reflection of the idea, or beauty, earthly beauty. This is why the soul of man in the presence of beauty feels the strongest longing, an uncontrollable longing ; we term that feeling love, and it seems to us that love strives for the possession of a beloved being : but that is not true. It strives for that idea above the heavens, the reflection of which the soul sees in the beloved being ; and under its influence the soul takes on holiness, its lost wings grow anew, the soul regains the capacity for a return, after throwing off the fetters of the body, to its habitation above the heavens.

This is obviously only a parable—also only a reflection of a divine idea hovering before the eyes of the prophet's soul. But this parable of Platonic love has always possessed and still possesses in the highest degree that capacity which the prophet himself ascribed to the most perfect reflections in the visible world of the beauty above the heavens—the capacity of giving wings to our soul and of directing its flight, above the mists of visibility, to its tabernacle above the heavens.

And the gods ?

A reader of Plato notes, not without amazement, that they play a rather secondary part in this duality of worlds. Eternal are the ideas that abide above the heavens, eternal and inviolable is the law of their reflection in material beneath the heavens, eternal also is the very material that receives the stamp of the ideas. God is not its creator : he is only the master that shapes it, an artisan—a ' demiourgos '.

Plato's teaching here depends on two fundamental doctrines of the ' Daedalian ' philosophy of religion ; we have not yet had an opportunity to speak of them and must now atone for the omission.

The first is the idea of fate and of the dependence of the gods on it. It appears most forcibly in the oldest parts of Homer, which do not admit divine omnipotence: Zeus weighs on the scales of Moira the destiny of men and cannot give aid to a man condemned by Moira. Later follows a strengthening of the conception of divine omnipotence, the crown of which is the words in the Odyssey (x. 306): 'The gods can do all'. Henceforward Moira is nothing else than the will of the gods and of Zeus; the gods and Zeus assign her to men: the primeval spinner as of old spins the thread of man's life, but the god guides her toil. This conception wins its utmost power in the religion of Apollo:

To men I will make known the unerring will of Zeus—

[Homeric Hymn to Apollo, 132]

the first-born son of the ruler of Olympus proclaims at his birth.

. . . But what is Moira? In my opinion, the knowledge and the prophetic power of Earth, or of nature: the Russian critic Pisarev was very near the truth when he saw in her a personification of the law of causality. The authority of Moira over Zeus is the natural correspondent of the idea of the supremacy of primeval Earth over Zeus, who was born in time and who trembles at the thought of his own destruction at the hands of the Giants. So this authority vanished when Apollo proclaimed that Zeus also was eternal both in the past and in the future.

It vanished, but not entirely : the older parts of the Iliad were still a part of the popular consciousness—no canon had proclaimed them heretical ; and while Greek religion lives, the idea of divine omnipotence is in constant rivalry with the idea of the authority of Moira over the gods. If a Christian thinks that his religion has overcome this rivalry, let him try to answer the childish question whether God can bring it to pass that two and two make something else than four.

Religious thought in the sixth and fifth centuries made profit of this rivalry in its own way. The gods rule over men, but over the gods rules law (nomos). For this very reason the thought of that time was reconciled to polytheism even on the basis of popular conceptions. The 'irresistible' argument of Mohammed, that polytheism would lead to anarchy, it would have recognized as fully worthy of his barbaric intellect, which had never known a law-abiding city-state (polis). Yet if even man, the more perfect he becomes, the more willingly subordinates himself to civic law, what shall we think of the most perfect of the perfect, the gods ?

Next—matter with its primeval existence : here too we recognize that same Earth, only expanded and logically—not actually—deified. The fact must be emphasized that the Greek in the most illustrious epochs of his history never even for a moment supposed that god could create the earth, that is, matter, out of nothing. To be sure, the Theogony of Hesiod seems to imply that before Earth (and Uranus, the heavens) there was chaos; but that is only a figure of speech, nothing more. Chaos in Hesiod means 'a yawning mouth'. The Greek carried out consistently a conception which in some modern languages is expressed in a comparison of the heavens to the palate: thus Polish niebo, heavens; and podniebienie, palate. The world is as it were a mouth. The palate corresponds to the heavens (in Greek ouranos has both meanings); the earth is the tongue, a flat disk in space; the lower jaw, if you wish, is Tartarus. Let us imagine that there is neither earth, nor heavens (nor Tartarus)—what will remain? Chaos: that is, a mouth, a yawning void, nothingness. That is what Hesiod means. But never did it occur to his thoughts that any being by his magisterial word created the heavens and the earth out of nothing, out of a void.

Later speculation again took advantage in its own way of Hesiod's concepts of 'chaos' and 'Earth'. It understood literally, and not figuratively, their sequence in time: consequently to the word 'chaos' a new meaning must be given, the same one to which we are accustomed. 'Chaos' is disorderly matter; its opposite is 'cosmos', matter in a state of order. So there was an act that brought about order in matter; the author of that act is god.

Such is the view of Plato ; here we will not enter into details.

As the creator of the order of the world, however, god has to deal with passive matter, resistant in its passivity. He himself, as the being who has introduced system, is the source of good and only of good, as the sun is the source only of light and of warmth. We call dark and cold those parts of matter which have not yet received a sufficient portion of the sun's light and warmth ; in exactly the same way an insufficient penetration of that same spiritualized matter by the force of good, we call evil.

The gods are mediators between the ideas and men. All the ideas are subject to one, the idea of good ; the good gods foster good among men, never evil. And you, poets, as teachers of the people, should enlighten it in precisely that spirit. If you wish to represent in your works that the gods also send down evil to men, you may do so, but you must needs indicate that this apparent evil, sufferings and the like, has good as its highest aim. In the good lies the justification of all that proceeds from the gods.

The gods, moreover, when they communicate with men, themselves employ mediators to that end ; these mediators are the daemons. In the religious philosophy of Plato this concept, the meaning of which is uncertain in the popular faith, receives a definite sense of lower, mediative forces. Every man has his daemon, his guardian spirit, whom he received at birth, or even before his birth ; there exist also daemons in general, the messengers of the gods. These bear to the gods the prayers of men and to men the sentences of the gods ; all the region beneath the heavens is full of daemons.

As a daemon also we must regard that being at whose mysterious touch a man who has beheld earthly beauty, strives towards that beauty which he once beheld in his habitation above the heavens, in consequence of which his soul receives wings and gains the capacity to return whence it came. Love is the first and the last word of Plato's philosophy.

Penetrated through and through with the murmur of poetry, all trembling from the joyous emotion of an ardent soul, the philosophy of Plato by the potent force of its charm called together men of kindred temperament beneath the rustling plane trees of Academus, until, after many generations, it produced a temporary reaction in the shape of the sharp scepticism of Arcesilaüs and the school of the ' Middle Academy ' ; of this, as sterile in matters of religion, we shall say nothing. All may be included in two words : ancient Voltairianism.

But before this time, in the grove of the Lycean Apollo, there blazed forth another torch of religious thought, which was lighted by a pupil of Plato, faithful and loving, but not an enthusiast, only a sober and judicious man, Aristotle. 'Of two friends, Plato and the truth, one must prefer the truth.' (Compare Ethics, i. 4.) The truth, his truth, was as follows :

Life is motion : all that lives moves : the source of motion we call deity. Deity is moved by no one, for if it were moved, it would have a source of motion outside itself and of itself would not be motion ; but, not being moved, it nevertheless moves, for it lives. It is moved by itself and it moves itself ; in it and only in it the active and the passive capacity for motion form a unit. But the world is moved by the deity, which therefore must be in touch with it. (' Gravitation ' Aristotle would not have understood ; and, to speak perfectly frankly, neither do we understand it.) The deity is in touch with the world, abiding in the expanse above the heavens, immediately beyond the ' firmament ', or first and most perfectly moved sphere of the cosmos. There are many of these spheres and there are many gods who set them in motion, and who derive their strength to move them from the supreme deity ; therein lies the truth of the popular parable of polytheism.

But what externally appears as motion, internally is thought ; the supreme deity, the source of motion, is also the source of thought, is the supreme reason. Here too the active and the passive capacity form a unit : deity thinks itself and is thought by itself. And in consequence of its supreme perfection, thought and will, which are divided in man, also form a unit in it. In man will is directed towards what seems to him beauty—but to the deity nothing can seem: the object of his thought and will is true beauty. This beauty the deity realizes through thought and will—realizes it in the cosmos, which it moves.

Herein lies the supreme happiness of the deity; again the popular parable speaks the truth, when it recognizes the gods not only as immortal, but as happy. Man, however, cannot conceive of this happiness. Only at times, excessively rarely, do we succeed, by the exertion of all our powers of thought, in burying ourselves within ourselves, so that we begin to live by reason—and for us those are moments of incomparable happiness; but the deity experiences this happiness always and eternally.

It thinks itself, its perfect beauty; and thinking it, it strives towards it by will; and striving towards it by will, it realizes it in the cosmos which it moves, in accord with the aim of the universe, which it thinks. This realization depends on the interpenetration of matter by deity. Deity and matter—again that same primordial dualism, the Zeus and the Earth of the popular parable. Just as deity is primeval, so is matter—the idea of the creation of the world from nothing is foreign to Aristotle, as it is equally foreign, and organically so, to the healthy Greek reason in general. Neither the deity nor matter had a beginning, and hence their motion also had no beginning. Deity is the cause, but not the beginning of motion.

Here something is involved which is unintelligible for us, and organically so. The philosophy of Aristotle leads to evolutionism, but evolutionism not in time, but merely in causality. Let us humble ourselves and be reconciled to this.

Matter (hylē), which of itself is bereft of qualities and forms, possesses an unlimited capacity for acquiring them ; it is then unlimited possibility (dynamis, potentia). In it therefore are potentially (dynamically) included all qualities and all forms ; the gradual realization of these qualities and forms, the transfer of them from potentiality to actuality or energy, transfers matter itself from a state bereft of qualities and forms to a state possessing qualities and forms of being (ousia, substantia).

Gradual realization—but, I repeat, gradual not in time. The first stage is the four elements, two extreme (earth with its striving downward and fire with its striving upward) and two intermediate. The second stage is inorganic nature. In the next stage appears the soul, in which and through which the further gradation is developed. The vegetative soul is capable of growth and reproduction. The animal soul is capable of sensual perception. And finally—always omitting transitional forms—the human soul is capable of thought, possesses reason.

Reason is then the kernel of the human soul in its vegetative-animal nature; in that soul it acts in more or less the same way that the divine reason acts in matter. Reason itself also, as reason, is of divine origin, is a spark of that supreme fire above the heavens. So it is not subject to dissolution and death. Though the deductions of Aristotle as to the fate of the soul after the death of the body are distinguished by extreme caution and moderation—Luther even concluded from them that Aristotle denied the immortality of the soul, and cursed him for it—yet it is evident that he limits mortality to the vegetative-animal nature of the human soul. Set free from its fetters, the divine reason returns to its source and unites anew with it in harmonious, mighty being; in this manner Aristotle incorporated in his philosophy the profound parable of the Orphic religion.

But even during life, thanks to the presence in the soul of a spark of reason, man is a creature akin to the deity. Reason makes him capable of the highest sort of virtue, of dianoetic virtue, distinct from ethical virtue, which rests on native qualities and unconscious habit; reason also at times permits him to tear himself free from the gravitation of his vegetative-animal soul, to bury himself within himself and through internal contemplation (theōria) to have an early taste of the final happiness, when, united anew with his source above the heavens, he shall share in its thought of the eternal, indestructible beauty.

A house and garden by the Dipylon Gate in Athens at the beginning of the third century ; a modest house and a modest garden. From that house faithful friends carry forth on warm days a man incurably ill, that the gentle air and the gentle sun may soothe his sufferings. Then the sick man expounds to them the philosophy of his sickness.

It is Epicurus.

All depends on the body ; there is naught in the world except the body and bodies. The body is formed by the gathering and cohesion of atoms of various forms. The smoothest of them compose what we call the soul ; entering our body, thanks to their smoothness, they support its cohesion and are themselves supported by it in cohesion—for a certain time. Death, the severance of soul and body, brings with it the dissolution of both : the slow dissolution of the body and the immediate dissolution of the soul. The immortality of the soul is an empty dream.

The world likewise is a body, a collection of the bodies of which it is composed ; it arose in the course of time through the gathering and cohesion of those same atoms, and in the course of time will similarly dissolve and perish. And not it alone, but all worlds, however many there may be.

And the gods? Obviously they exist, seeing that everybody recognizes their existence—here the discursive reasoning of Epicurus the individual bows before a universal intuition. They are just such beings as all men recognize them to be: in the first place, immortal; in the second, happy. Obviously they are also corporeal and consequently are composed of atoms, yet they possess the capacity of doing eternally what we men can do only temporally; that is, of renewing their being by separating certain atoms from themselves and acquiring others. The worlds do not possess that capacity, and so they are not the dwelling of the gods. The gods dwell in the spaces between the worlds—as it were in quiet oases between the storms of the worlds. And seeing that they are happy, it follows—and here the gaze of the sick man rested with love and sorrow on his friends, who, full of anxiety, observed the symptoms of the return of his sufferings—it follows that they are free from cares for the human race and for the world in general. Therefore the world and the human race are abandoned entirely to the mechanical action of their atoms, entirely governed by two blind forces, necessity and chance.

Not entirely. The world is, to be sure; but besides this, man possesses free will, or, to speak more exactly, the power of choice (prohairesis), which makes it possible for him to gain what is best from situations created for him by necessity and chance. This did not follow logically from the mechanistic premises of the sage, but it followed as an obvious inference from the manliness with which he surmounted his illness, from the gentle and kindly smile with which he endured its torturing attacks.

At all events man is left to himself ; the gods, taking no part in the founding of the universe, do not trouble themselves about it. There is no divine providence. This results inevitably from the fundamental premise of the happiness of the gods, and just as inevitably from our experience of life. Would the prosperity of the evil be possible, or—here again the sight of the sufferings of the master excluded the possibility of an objection—the misery of the good, if the gods really troubled themselves about our lot ?

For the time being let us also refrain from objections, and think through to the end the thought of Epicurus. Is this a religion or the negation of religion ? Epicurus recognizes the existence of the gods : they are immortal, happy, even anthropomorphic, since ' seeing that the human form is the most perfect of all, it is impossible to suppose that the gods have preferred to it any other '. Yet at the same time Epicurus deprives them of all share in the government of the world and of the fate of man ; he removes them to the solitary islands of the spaces between the worlds. What cult is possible under such conditions ? Why offer prayers that will not be heard ? Why make sacrifices and observe festivals that give no joy to those whose worship they serve? And what is a religion without a cult?

Here a contemptuous smile flitted over the lips of the sage. 'Yes, men, that is like you: you wish to derive profit from your divine service. But for us it is needless. We worship the gods as models of perfection, as higher beings, untouched by the impermanence and transitoriness of the world. We share in your prayers, sacrifices, and festivals; but, in distinction from you, we do it disinterestedly.'

As the reader sees, the kernel of the religious philosophy of Epicurus is the idea of divine providence—or, to speak more exactly, its negation. Neither Plato nor Aristotle would agree with him. In Plato god, the source of all good for men, distinctly gives them a helping hand, acting through his servants the daemons; in Aristotle he does this mediately, realizing in the universe his premeditated aim of beauty and goodness. Least of all would they agree with the arguments brought forward by Epicurus. There are two of them: the argument from above and the argument from below. From above: the happiness of the gods, which it is alleged cannot be reconciled with care. Verily this is a philosophy of illness! Happiness for a healthy man is inherent in strength and its employment, in activity and energy, in the realization of a great aim. Even the strong man has his weakness:

he needs some one who needs him. But without this weakness there would be no strength, and likewise there would be no happiness.

The argument from below : the prosperity of the evil and the misery of the good. The objections of Plato and of Aristotle I shall consider below ; at present I shall indicate the basis which only could lend support alike to those objections and to the argument itself. The reader has not forgotten that complete, happy consciousness which in the epoch of the greatest power of the Greek spirit anticipated even the very possibility of the argument of Epicurus—he has not forgotten phylonomism. So now I must add that at the end of the fifth century, the time of Euripides, phylonomism begins to decline. It still maintains itself among average men, finding support in state institutions to which in former times it had given occasion ; but it was counteracted by all the doctrines that proclaimed the worth of the individual soul, not excepting those of the Academy and the Lyceum. The sickness of Epicurus did not permit him to found a family ; this branch condemned to wither aimlessly had no feeling of solidarity with young shoots such as it was not fated to produce. Improperly generalizing his philosophy of illness, Epicurus counselled other men also not to found a family, that source of continual cares—and cares were what his sick soul most feared. It is clear that he stood firmly and entirely on the basis of ontonomism.

. . . The strength of the philosophy of Epicurus is not in its religious aspect ; it is in his physics, in an atomism, unoriginal to be sure, but independently comprehended and developed, which after many metamorphoses still lives to-day, as the fundamental theory of physics and chemistry. But for the development of religious thought Epicureanism, very influential in the course of the last centuries of Greece, had only a negative importance. Its aesthetic supplement, the recognition that the gods existed and should be worshipped, was not immediately occasioned by the atomistic theory as such ; it had no great weight with the masters of Epicureanism and was completely ignored by their pupils and by common men. It was hard to conceive of the gods without divine providence ; for the most part the Epicureans after all were atheists, and by their atheism attracted some men and repelled others.

In the very centre of Athens, on the market-place, rose a building which the city of Pallas might rightly regard as a monument of its heroism ; it was a hall with a colonnade, called the Painted Stoa (Porch). Built in the fifth century by a hero of the Persian Wars, Cimon, the son of Miltiades, it was adorned at his recommendation with frescoes representing the heroic combats of the Athenians in times both mythical and historical. In our epoch, when in the hospital atmosphere of the garden by the Dipylon Gate there bloomed the feeble flower of the religious philosophy of Epicurus, the heroic Stoa on the market-place at last received a soul in the form of a philosophy of heroism—the philosophy of the Stoa, as it was usually called, or Stoicism.

To be sure, in its doctrine of the deity the Stoa is little different from the Lyceum; each sect may with equal propriety be called both monotheistic and polytheistic—something which is quite natural for consistent religious thought, unfettered by the chains of worship of words. The deity in its essence is one, but its manifestations are many. More strongly than Aristotle the Stoa emphasizes the materiality of this one deity; but of course its matter is of the most subtle sort, fire, and moreover not elemental but ethereal fire, which is both the principle of motion and reason. In the form of fire it interpenetrates the whole universe, vivifying it and spiritualizing it; the Stoic religion is a pantheism. And, moreover, it is an evolutionary pantheism: interpenetrating the matter of the universe, fire conducts it to ever higher forms. Here we have no need to humble ourselves; in agreement with our own mode of thought, the Stoa recognizes evolution in time, and not merely in causality.

Fire, the soul of the universe—why not call it Zeus?—forms, first of all, the four elements, which are likewise living and divine: earth—Demeter, water—Posidon, air—Hera, and (elemental) fire—Hephaestus. Within the elements there exist other divine forms, and above all the heavenly bodies : the sun—Apollo, and the moon—Artemis. As the reader sees, the Greek religion profited by the fact that it was in its foundations a religion of nature : thanks to this primary quality it entered entirely into the Stoic system, was entirely justified by it. But not only as a religion of nature : Zeus is likewise the supreme reason and the entire fullness of the divine being in beauty, goodness, and truth ; and the individual gods, as his reflections in matter, share in these qualities of his. Thus in the fire of the Stoic system the Greek popular religion attained its summit in the realm of thought, just as in its ritual it attained its summit in the realm of feeling.

A spark of the divine reason is the rational soul, which is incorporated in man, to be sure, not at the moment of conception and not at the moment of birth : an infant is irrational, the counterpart of a beast ; its soul is only psychē and not pneuma. Man breathes in his rational soul only gradually, from the atmosphere, in which it is spread abroad ; but, breathing it in, he individualizes it in accordance with his own inclinations, impressing on it his own stamp, owing to which it cannot after death dissolve in the essence of the divine reason, but preserves its being, as an individual. As may be seen from this, the Stoa has an attitude towards individuation fundamentally different from that of the transformed Orphism of Aristotle's teaching : individuation is not an evil, but a good, and a man should prize his traits as an individual, if they are good. Stoicism is the most individualistic of the philosophic doctrines of antiquity.

Therefore it is fundamentally ontonomic. Consequently the problem of Job rises before it in all its might. The evil man fares well and the good man ill, and for this there is neither justification in the life of past generations nor recompense in the life of those to come ; each man answers for himself, each life forms a whole with its own beginning and end. Where then is the justice of divine providence ?

Perchance in the life beyond the grave ?

Perchance. Stoicism recognizes that life, and moreover, in the spirit of popular religion, for each soul separately. The soul is individually immortal ; a judgment awaits it after it has abandoned the earthly realm, and after the judgment both reward and punishment. The famous 'Dream of Scipio', which forms the conclusion of Cicero's Republic, gives us a decidedly majestic picture of the Stoic paradise, a picture which enraptured many men even in Christian times. However—whoever wishes, let him believe ; whoever does not wish, let him not believe. Stoicism, being also in this regard akin to the religion of Apollo, recognizes a world beyond the grave, but does not insist on details.

How shall we answer the question why the evil man fares well and the good man ill? By a denial of the question itself. This is the very subject on which, following indications given by Plato, the Stoa develops its lofty ethics. It is not true that the evil man fares well and the good man ill. 'Well' means 'in possession of good', 'ill' means 'in deprivation of good'. And there is but one good—'virtue'; the good man possesses it always, the evil man—never. Virtue itself by itself suffices for a happy life.

This is the philosophy of heroism.

Stoicism and Epicureanism rule men's minds in the course of the four centuries preceding and following the birth of Christ, and in that epoch not Greece but Rome was the arena of human culture. Here then we may survey the fruits that the two doctrines produced, and by this test verify their worth: I think that this is a decisive test. Epicureanism produced at its best mild aesthetes such as Atticus and Maecenas; and at its worst, selfish squanderers of the chance gift of a life bereft of deity. But Stoicism produced Cato, Brutus, Thrasea, Seneca, Marcus Aurelius—all those famous men who by their life and by their death bore witness to the virtue dwelling in their souls. Stoicism verily found its justification: not only in the cold shadow of the Painted Porch, but in the scorching arena of life it was the philosophy of heroism.

VIII

THE REVELATION OF GOD IN TRUTH

LIKE the other two supreme revelations of God, his revelation in truth is a derivatory phenomenon in the development of the religious thought of humanity. Homer is still far enough away from it. God in Homer, in the first place, does not even always possess the truth: his knowledge is at first just as limited as his power; and only in the Odyssey does Homer proclaim the principle, 'The gods know all', along with the principle, 'The gods can do all'. Still less does god feel the necessity for announcing nothing but the truth. Zeus sends down to Agamemnon a deceitful dream; Pallas in mortal form tempts Pandarus with a fancied prospect of success to break the truce by a treacherous shot; and this same Pallas, appearing in mortal form to her favourite Odysseus, listens with a tender smile to his fictitious narrative of his own adventures, and later makes herself known to him and in kindly fashion forgives him his deceit, confessing that even she herself is fond of trickery.

But as the sun disperses the mist, so the beams of Apollo in the eighth, seventh, and sixth centuries destroy in human consciousness all thought of the possibility of connecting the two concepts deity and lying. 'A lie thou mayst not touch,' says Pindar (Pyth. ix. 75), the prophet of Apollo, concerning his god, and moreover he understands by a 'lie' not only subjective but even objective departure from truth. Truth and light are, as it were, mutually correspondent concepts; Apollo rules over both of them, and after him the rest of the gods as well. In this field of religion, as well as in others, the Pythagorean school, the enlightener of Hellas in the sixth century, did fruitful work. To the master himself is ascribed the remarkable answer to the question, 'When is man most like god?'—'When he speaks the truth.'

But since the poems of Homer after all remained current, and through them wanton fancies as to the frivolous attitude of the gods towards the truth might filter into the popular consciousness, therefore Plato in his Republic states energetically that they must not be tolerated. No, where god is, there is no place for lying. God cannot err, for he knows all; he cannot clothe his words in the garment of lying or his form in the garment of deceit, for in his whole being he is truth and nothing but truth. And if we conceive of Pan in a double form, this has a symbolic sense—Pan is the word (logos). And the word has a double form, being both truthful and lying, abiding by its true essence on the heights in communion with the gods, and by its lying essence in a lower sphere, which alone corresponds to its 'goatish' nature. . . . In the original we have a play on words: 'goatish' is in Greek tragikos, 'tragic'; by the choice of this term Plato alludes to mythology, which has warped men's conception of the gods.

Yes, god is truth, possesses truth and proclaims the truth. In god is truth and in truth is god.

We must thoroughly assimilate this conviction, which is obviously in complete accord with the teaching of every religion of a higher type. We must join with it still another conviction, also perfectly natural for us as Christians, that god loves the human race and cares for it. Then we shall perhaps understand—not the origin, but the obstinate persistence, even in the minds of the most cultivated men, of that beautiful but sterile flower of Greek religion which is called mantic or divination.

Not the origin, I repeat. In fact mantic, as such, is older than either of the convictions which later became its basis. In its primitive forms it has small connection with religion. Let us recall our own system of various and sundry omens: a vein twitches on my right temple—'What does that signify?'—I stub my foot on the threshold as I leave the house—a snake crosses my path—somebody sneezes—and so on. Here, on the one hand, we have a naïve empiricism, the observed repetition of certain events after certain signs; on the other, a seeming analogy with something which is important for our life in nature, and which we call prognostication: the swallows are flying high—that forebodes fair weather. The imperfection of science does not yet enable man to distinguish phenomena the connection of which is only enigmatic from other phenomena the connection of which is totally impossible; all alike merge in a general mist of fragments of nature and of life that have a mysterious influence upon one another.

In our own epoch cultivated men have recognized that the mantic of omens belongs to the domain of superstition; Theophrastus, in his Character of the 'superstitious' man (deisidaimon), regards it in the proper light. Quite another thing is religious mantic. It would obviously be possible to include even the mantic of omens under this rubric: for who knows what means the god who loves us may employ to caution us against a fatal decision? Evidently the boundary line is very indistinct; and if any man should wish to violate common sense and heed all the countless omens that he encounters, and thereby to change his life into a hell—nobody forbids him. But a rational man is saved by his mere common sense.

Leaving aside both the mantic of omens and another mantic, different from it but equally low, the mantic of charms of all sorts—by means of a sieve, of meal, of the pecking of grain by a hen, and so on—let us turn to that which had an evident and universally recognized connection with religion. It had two branches, 'atechnic' mantic or prophesying, and 'entechnic' mantic or augury. In the first case the god addresses man immediately, in the second he sends him signs that require interpretation by an experienced augur. Of course, there could be no exact boundary between them; the mantic most widely known in antiquity—and in our own times also—that of prophetic dreams, occupied an intermediate position, since dreams were frequently symbolic and required a soothsayer to interpret them.

Let us begin with dreams. If we have dreamed of a dead man, it is plain that his own soul has visited us: having learned the secrets of the underworld, it has become prophetic, and if it is kindly disposed towards us we may rely on its words. If we dream of a living man, this may be interpreted by the supposition that the god has created his phantom and has sent him to us as the god's own messenger; and in such a case his words are equally credible. But it is also possible that an actual Dream has assumed his form, and then the matter becomes complicated. For Dreams dwell in the same abode as the souls, in the underworld : by day, like bats, they slumber in a grotto ; by night they fly forth, whether at the suggestion of one of the souls who are their neighbours, or of their own free will, and appear to men in their sleep. Such is the famous Morpheus, so called because he likes to assume the ' forms ' of men. At all events one cannot entirely depend on such dreams ; evidently, like the daemons, the Dreams can proclaim the truth—but the problem is whether they will choose to do so. It all depends on the question through which ' gate ' the Dreams have flown forth : unfortunately there are two such gates—and if I add, ' one of horn and the other of ivory ', my reader must translate these terms into the Greek language in order to understand why the Dreams are credible when they fly through the first, and not so when they fly through the second. But since they do not inform us through which gate they have flown to us, then— Therefore Euripides informs us in a jesting song (Iphigenia among the Taurians, 1234 ff.) how Apollo, wishing to free himself of an unworthy competition, prevailed on Zeus to deprive the Dreams of credibility.

Of course, the reader has long since understood that all that has been said here is a fancy of the bards, not binding on faith. But in general the conviction of the prophetic significance of remarkable dreams was very widespread, and a 'dream-book' by Artemidorus has been preserved, large, curious, and rather important. Even philosophy reckoned with this conviction, interpreting the prophetic character of dreams by the supposition that the soul of the sleeper, unhampered by the bonds of the body, regained its divine nature. But our own comforting proverb, 'Dreams do deceive, in God we believe', was also known to the ancients: a man who had had a disquieting dream, in the morning 'told it to the Sun' (a subtle act from a psychological point of view), thus purifying himself by its rays; and then he prayed to Apollo that he might fulfill the dream only in so far as it was favourable; but in so far as it was hostile, that he might turn it against his enemies.

The prophetic character ascribed to the souls of the dead at times leads men to address them, that is, to conjure them up. . . . Greece too had its Witches of Endor. . . . Nevertheless, in well-ordered states they were not tolerated; men seized by a fatal curiosity must betake themselves to the necromancers of savage Epirus or half-savage Arcadia. A reader may find in Herodotus (v. 92) the story of how Periander, tyrant of Corinth, conjured up the soul of his wife Melissa, whom he had slain, or in Plutarch (Cimon) another tale, how Pausanias, king of Sparta, summoned forth the soul of the maid of Byzantium, whom he also had slain: they make a deep impression.

The gods abide in a pure sphere. Entering into near relations with certain mortals beloved by them, they make them prophets. Thus Hesiod at the opening of his Theogony tells us how the Muses appeared to him on Helicon and endowed him with prophetic power ; this tale of the Boeotian bard has been justly compared with the statement of Amos in the Old Testament as to how he was made a prophet. The Bacides and the Sibyls were also regarded as prophets, and owing to the free life of Greece it is not strange that a large number of prophetic wanderers of both sexes also made their appearance and found a hearing among the people. At times the favour of the god was hereditary : thus we hear of the prophetic family of the Iamidae at Olympia. Occasionally this favour was extended to all the inhabitants of a certain city : such was the case, for example, in the city of Telmissus. To be sure, this favour might consist not so much in a native gift of prophesying as in the art of soothsaying from signs, and in such case inheritance is natural.

Yet the god could immediately bestow prophetic power, not only on a man, but on a place—this was a quite intelligible consequence of the deification of nature. Here we come to the most brilliant manifestation of ancient Greek mantic—to the oracle ; and above all, of course, to ‘ the common hearth of all Hellas ’, the oracle at Delphi. On the slopes of Parnassus, at the base of two naked, perpendicular crags between which flows the Castalian stream, this spot even now overwhelms the traveller by its majestic beauty. Here once in a sacred grove arose the temple of Apollo, surrounded by a whole forest of treasures, statues, and other votive offerings of all sorts, a living museum not only of Greek religion but of Greek history. Here on the appointed day—once a month or even oftener—pilgrims gathered who desired to propound questions to the god. After a sacrifice, in an order settled by lot, they questioned the god, some by word of mouth, others in writing, but without crossing the threshold of the temple. The temple servant transferred the questions to the priest, and he bore them into the interior of the temple, to its holy of holies (adyton). Here on a tripod sat a maiden, the Pythia, who fell into an unconscious state, as they say, owing to vapours that issued from the earth beneath the tripod. Her words, often disconnected, were caught up by the ‘prophets’ standing near, who introduced order into them, and in solemn cases gave them a versified form: such was the answer of the god. —

This practice continued from the most ancient times up to those of the Emperor Julian the Apostate, more than a thousand years: how could trickery survive so long amid the most intelligent nation of antiquity? Just because there was no trickery in it; there was delusion, if you wish. Cases of distinct prophecies of the future—such as the oracles of Oedipus and of Croesus—belong to the realm of legend; in historical times Delphi was the home of good counsel how one must act in order that the issue might be 'better'; this 'better' (ameinon) is the general watchword of the god of Delphi. Evidently in this form the god's answer could not be confuted: even in case of ill success one could not maintain that if one had not acted by his counsel, the issue would not have been still worse. Then again, after questioning the god, a believer gained greater confidence, greater self-reliance—and confidence and self-reliance are always one more chance of success.

Let us pass to augury: we shall here touch on only the two most solemn methods of it, on augury from the flight of birds and from sacrifices. The foundation of the first was the belief that the gods, and Zeus in particular, abode on the heights; the birds, especially birds of prey—it was the flight of these birds only that was the basis of augury—were most near to them, and therefore could be regarded as bearers of tidings from them. Obviously they could not be observed in all places; the augurs had their elevations, from which they observed not only the flight of eagles, but their cries, their behaviour towards one another, towards other birds, and towards beasts (especially snakes), and the like: the phenomena which they remarked they then had to interpret.

While making a sacrifice a man is in immediate communion with the god; one can readily understand that from the various phenomena that accompany the sacrifice he tries to divine the will of the god for whom the sacrifice was destined. These phenomena were of two sorts: some were connected with the burning of the sacrificial fire; others with the arrangement and the form of the entrails of the beast sacrificed, especially with the design of the veins of its liver. Obviously all this had to be artificially interpreted. Augury of this sort was specially employed before a battle for the purpose of determining whether the god blessed the given moment, or whether it would be 'better' to delay action. Therefore generals usually kept augurs with them; and yet there is much food for reflection in the words of Socrates in Plato's Laches (198 E), that 'the augur should be under the authority of the general, and not the general under the authority of the augur'.

In the last centuries of the life of the ancient world—later than its flourishing epoch, which we are here considering—there rose and was developed a special sort of augury which eclipsed all others and which, despite all the protests of the Church, penetrated even into Christianity: this was astrology. As early as the third century before Christ Greece received its first fruits from Babylon through the agency of Berosus, a learned priest of Baal; but its transformation into a complicated system was the work of Greece itself.

Practice makes no great demands on the intellect: the average Greek constantly availed himself of mantic without inquiring too deeply into its scientific premises; he turned to the gods with the same confidence with which children turn to their parents for counsel.

But for thought mantic was a torturing riddle—and not only for philosophic thought.

Of course, the gods love us and therefore grant us cautions, whether we address them or not: very good. But, then, what sense is there in the avoidance of an evil omen? I start on a journey—and I do not bid farewell to a person dear to me, for fear that he may weep and that his tears may bring misfortune upon me. I have arrived in a carriage, and, though I am strong and healthy, I bid my servants help me dismount, lest—god forbid!—I should stumble and thereby invite misfortune. What sense is there in this? Perhaps god wishes to send me an omen, in order to caution me, and I am hindering him!

It is obvious that there is no sense in this: but take ourselves, men of modern times—why do we avoid shaking hands with a guest across the threshold and sitting down the thirteenth at the table? Evidently a transfer of ideas has occurred: the prophetic and cautioning omen has turned into a magic omen. Even a person who believes in divination may convince himself of this without difficulty. He convinces himself—and nevertheless he avoids evil omens as far as is possible: after all such things are disagreeable.

Then, again, of course the gods know all.—What does that mean: ‘all’? As to the past we agree: Demaratus inquires of the god of Delphi who was his father—that is something that we can understand. As to the present we also agree: I may inquire of the same god where my fugitive slave is at present—that is something that we can also understand. But as to the future?—Let us consider. The future certainly depends, among other factors, on the question whether I act in this way or in that: whoever says, ‘The god possesses a knowledge of the future’, thereby informs me, ‘The god knows how you will act’. If so, then my acts are predestined: consequently free will does not exist.

On the other hand, freedom of the will is the fundamental postulate of all Greek thinking, of all Greek morality. What shall we do about it?

The older epoch found a solution in an unformulated theory, which I have termed ‘conditional fatalism’. As a matter of fact, my will is free, but yet it is only one of the factors influencing the future; then let us exclude it. Let the god’s answer be conditional: ‘If Laius begets a son, he will be killed by him’; ‘If Croesus passes the Halys, he will destroy a powerful kingdom.' Well then, if he does not, obviously he will not. In poetry this is very fine, but deeper and more exact thought will prove to us that this theory suits only Robinson Crusoe. For a man who dwells among other men the future depends not only on his own will, but on the wills of all those who surround him; and therefore the god's answer must be beset with such a multitude of conditions as deprive it of all value.

Hence in serious philosophy we find no trace of conditional fatalism. There the question of divination is immediately connected with the question of divine providence; and therefore we can easily understand why divination was recognized by the Stoa, which preached faith in providence, and was rejected not only by the school of Epicurus, but by the sceptics of the New Academy as well. The books of Cicero On Divination, which the Voltairianism of the eighteenth century found so important, give us an echo of this curious dispute.

Let us here consider only the positive attitude towards this question, that is, the teachings of the Stoa. If divination were impossible, the implication would be either that the gods have no knowledge of the future, or that they do not wish to reveal it to us, whether because they do not care for us, or because they regard such knowledge as useless for us. The first supposition is opposed to the idea that the deity is all-knowing, the second, to the idea that the deity is all-good, and the third is opposed to common sense. Such is the famous trilemma of the Stoa, which later came to life again in the optimism of Leibnitz.

Let us be frank : the last two points cannot be refuted. Not even the third. The usual cavilling answer is that knowledge of the future is often injurious to man ; but beyond all doubt it is also often useful to him—and that is quite sufficient for the Stoa. The one weak point in its trilemma is the first, and we already know why. The knowledge of the future ascribed to god has as its premise predestination, and predestination excludes the freedom of the will.

. . . Does it exclude it ? Determinism and indeterminism : the antinomy of Kant.

The Stoa did not set forth into this wilderness ; it sought a solution in another direction. It distinguished ' fate ', ' lot ', ' chance ' ; it wrote long treatises ' on possibility '. In vain : the ordinary aspect of things won the victory, and gradually reduced the freedom of the human will to a voluntary following of one's appointed lot. For Ducunt volentem fata, nolentem trahunt.

[SENECA, Epist. 107.]

Such is the hero of Virgil's Aeneid, who is fundamentally different from the heroes of free will portrayed in ancient and modern tragedy, and who is therefore fundamentally unintelligible to the shallow criticism of to-day, especially that of the Germans—Boissier is the man who has understood him. Stamped on his brow is the motto that I have just cited, which casts over him a shadow of tragic sorrow. And this same stamp of sorrow we find likewise on the brows of the other great Stoics of the Empire : Seneca, Epictetus, the Emperor Marcus Aurelius. So it was of necessity : whoever had glanced into the prophetic abyss of Trophonius, the ancients were wont to say, never laughed thereafter.

Let us bow our heads before them—and turn with our souls towards those who, not burying themselves in metaphysical riddles, merely felt over them the kindly gaze of a deity full of love, and responded to it with filial gratitude. Such is Theseus in the Suppliants of Euripides :

Praise to the god who shaped in order's mould
 Our lives redeemed from chaos and the brute,
 First, by implanting reason, giving then
 The tongue, world-herald, to interpret speech ;
 Earth's fruit for food, for nurturing thereof
 Raindrops from heaven, to feed earth's fosterlings,
 And water her green bosom, therewithal
 Shelter from storm, and shadow from the heat,
 Sea-tracking ships, that traffic might be ours
 With fellow-men of that which each land lacks ;
 And, for invisible things or dimly seen,
 Soothsayers watch the flame, the liver's folds,
 Or from the birds divine the things to be.

[Suppliants, 210-213 : tr. WAY.]

'In god is the truth,' is one side of the dogma with which we are here concerned, if you choose to call it such. 'In truth is god,' is the other side. Here we shall have occasion to speak, not of a beautiful but sterile flower which showed itself on the tree of Greek religion, but of a strong and flowering branch, which produced and which still produces many magnificent fruits.

Every art is from god and to the glory of god—for god reveals himself in beauty. Every science is from god and to the glory of god—for god reveals himself in truth. The bards were the first teachers of Greece; the Muse not only sent them inspiration, but also gave them information, which they passed on to men. If all the rich didactic poetry of the school of Hesiod of the eighth and the seventh centuries had been preserved to us, I could support what I have said by numerous immediate examples; but even those mediate inferences to which I must restrict myself are perfectly certain. And if the Muse herself, as we have seen, retained to the latest times of Greece her position in the elementary school, the fact was merely an ontogenetic expression of her ancient phylogenetic rôle.

From the practice of healing connected with the cult of Asclepius there developed the science of medicine; the father of scientific medicine, Hippocrates, sprang from a family of priests of Asclepius, the Asclepiadae of the island of Cos ; and this island, the centre of the cult of Asclepius, was even in later times something in the nature of a faculty of medicine. A side branch of the science of the Asclepiadae was the knowledge of healing herbs, which in time developed into pharmacology and thereby became one of the two sources of scientific botany. The other source of botany, that to which the science owes its name, was the knowledge of plants fit for grazing, which was the gift of Hermes and Apollo, the gods of cattle-raising. Augury from the flight of birds forced men to pay heed to their life and habits ; thus arose ornithology, the first branch of zoology—in this way even that sterile flower was not completely without fruit. Similarly the scrutiny of the entrails of sacrificial animals, which was important in another branch of augury, as a side issue produced anatomy, which, although it was not the source of medicine, nevertheless united with it and thereby transformed it from empiricism into a science. Furthermore, the father of Greek mathematics and of our own, Pythagoras, was in point of fact a prophet of Apollo ; and there is a profound propriety in the legend which informs us that after discovering his famous proposition he offered a hecatomb to the god who had inspired him.

But the internal strength of every science, which enabled it to draw the proper inference from given premises, was the Logos, and this was consecrated to Hermes, who was therefore called Hermes-Logios. It was consecrated—that is too mild an expression. No, if verily ‘in truth is god’, then the Logos itself was a god, was the divine son of Hermes: ‘Hermetism’ recognizes him as such. In another place I have spoken of this phenomenon, which is in every way worthy of attention, and have established that the divine Logos, which became so important for Christian theology, had its origin in Greek religion, and not in philosophy.

So all honest workers of the Logos were in a greater or less degree prophets of god. When Diogenes entered on a torturing period of doubts, he applied with filial confidence to Apollo at Delphi. And Apollo, understanding the state of his soul, and alluding in his reply to the occupation of the father of Diogenes, who had been a money-changer at Sinope, advised him to ‘re-mint his coins’—in which counsel my reader will easily recognize the ‘transvaluation of values’ of a philosopher of very recent times.

Diogenes, as is well known, hearkened with all haste to this counsel; but in doing so he merely followed the example of another philosopher far more famous than himself—of him whose caricature some persons used to call him. Socrates had not ventured to apply to Delphi himself; one of his most ardent disciples did so for him. And Apollo proclaimed Socrates the wisest of mortals. This answer perplexed the thinker: he had been at the other extreme—from regarding his own ignorance as wisdom. But this ignorance had made him the pupil of every man that he met—seeing that every man imagined that he knew at least something. Socrates had asked his acquaintance to share his knowledge with him; and together with him, with the spade of the Logos, he had striven to dig to its foundations—and his hands had failed him when he saw the uselessness of his efforts. But now, winged by the word of the god, he began with redoubled zeal to serve the Logos; and when his fellow-citizens, disquieted by his activity, wished to force him to cease from that service, he replied: ‘I cannot: that would be disobedience to the god.’ Many have read Plato’s Apology of Socrates, from which I take this detail; but have many observed what is so clearly expressed in it: that its hero is not merely a sage, but a prophet-sage?

This is both a fact and a symbol: by making Socrates an eternal disciple in the name of the Logos and, in return for his discipleship, awarding him the palm of the highest wisdom, the god repeated in one person what in more ancient times he had done for all Hellas. Hellas likewise had regarded herself as the eternal disciple of almost all the peoples with whom she had come into contact by the will of fate—whereby, let us add, she led many men into error and still continues to do so. And owing to this, she became the wisest of all nations ; she became the mistress of the modern world.

‘ In truth is god ’—these words, profound as they are, nevertheless hold hidden within them a frightful danger. And the glory of Hellas would be incomplete if we could not prove that she avoided that danger.

There is but one truth : if god is in truth, then who is in untruth ?

If we venture to reply ‘ the devil ’, we shall open the lips of those who excommunicate, we shall light the pyre on which heretics are burned. We shall justify every manifestation of intolerance.

We have already seen that the devil was foreign to the Greek religion. There was god—and earth, ‘ mother ’ earth, materia ; this Latin word very beautifully expresses the depth of synthesis hidden in this concept in the feeling of the Greek. A mother cannot be a force of the devil. God is good, but matter is not evil : it is only unevenly penetrated by the goodness that flows from god ; and we call ‘ evil ’ only that which is not yet sufficiently warmed by the sun of good.

Here the situation is the same. God is truth, beyond a doubt ; and yet error (in the general sense of untruth) is not the devil and cannot be so, for there is no devil at all. Error is merely that field of consciousness on which the sun of god, who is truth, does not yet sufficiently shed its beams.

Seeing that this is the case, there is no purpose in excommunicating and casting anathemas ; men must cease to expel a devil who does not exist. Strive that the sun may conquer ; in it all shall be made perfect.

IX

CONCLUSION

Most of the facts cited in the present sketch are no secret for students of Greek religion ; but nevertheless that religion has here been illuminated with an entirely new and fresh light. This is due to the fundamental principle of which I spoke at the outset : we have lighted in our hearts the torch of religious feeling—and have left at home the dim rushlight of sectarianism.

But in the same measure that, when so illuminated, Greek religion has proved more beautiful and perfect, the more importunate has become the query: Why, then, did it disappear? We are wont to believe in the justice of the verdicts of history—and it was Greece which taught us to believe in it. What part in this disappearance was played by Justice, by her who shares the throne of Zeus ?

This query requires an answer, and the answer will form the ' conclusion ' of the present book.

We might reply by a request to compare the proud, free Hellenes, who in the epoch of Pericles and of Plato prayed to Athena-the-Maiden of Phidias, and who celebrated the mysteries of Demeter at Eleusis, with those humiliated Greeks who after the lapse of several centuries accepted the religion of the cross. We might show how their gradual subjection, the loss of their political freedom, their economic exploitation, the plundering of the treasures of their religious art, and the impoverishment of their festivals gradually deprived them of that ardour of spirit which blended in a harmonious whole with their joyous religion. The right of choice presupposes in men spiritual freedom; but a man in subjection awaits the imperious voice of a master, awaits a canon that shall take a burden from him—yes, the burden of liberty.—And this answer will contain a considerable portion of the truth.

We might point out that even in their state of intellectual slavery the Greeks, the inhabitants of ancient Hellas, did not quite of their own free will allow their ancient religion to be torn from them. The teachings of St. Paul on the Areopagus did not convert the Athenians, and even in later times the descendants of Pericles and Sophocles did not readily yield to the temptation of a foreign faith. Alas, what formed the principal charm of Greek religion, its cult of visible beauty, its deification of nature, its beautiful and joyous ritual—all this was the side of it most exposed to the blows of violence. The destruction of the house of Jehovah on Zion did not injure Judaism ; the religion survived in the rolls of the Torah and the Prophets, and the synagogue successfully continued the work of the temple. But when Alaric the Goth, a Christian and a barbarian, destroyed the temple of Demeter at Eleusis ; when the hammers of fanatics demolished the prophetic revelations of Phidias, Praxiteles, and their compeers ; when the processions to Pallas on her Acropolis and the spectacles in the theatre of Dionysus were forbidden—then in truth the very soul of Greek religion weakened and withered.—And this answer will contain another portion of the truth.

And finally—this third answer is in apparent opposition to the first two, but in reality completes them—and finally, the Greek religion did not entirely vanish from the consciousness of the Christianized world : it penetrated into it, it lives in it to this day, and will live so long as Christianity itself shall live. This answer contains a third, and the most important, portion of the truth. Experts know this, but the general public does not ; and since the present book is designed particularly for that public, it behoves us to examine more closely this third answer.

Judaism is universally regarded as the stock from which Christianity grew forth : with it then we will begin.

We must not close our eyes to the great merits—not only poetic, but moral and religious—of the Old Testament. From an absolute point of view it occupies a very honourable position; from a relative point of view it does also, if we compare with its religion the religions of the peoples that surrounded Israel—those Baals and those Astartes with their human sacrifices and their religious prostitution. But in the present case we must not compare it with them, but with the religion of a nation which, though it never called itself chosen, was nevertheless—no, for that very reason—really such. Here the result of the comparison and the relative estimate cannot be doubtful.

Judaism first of all did not recognize the revelation of god in beauty; it excluded one of the three ideals of perfection; it rejected one of the three sides of the sacred triangle in which for us the eternally watchful eye of the deity reposes. With it there also vanished the deification of nature: the Judean¹ did not cherish filial feelings for the great mother—Earth.

Goodness and truth remained; but even here one must make important reservations. The Judean's idea of good did not include a feeling of general human brotherhood, a humanitarian feeling: he limited his attachment to a small fraction of humanity, withdrawing in disgust from all others, building up between himself and them an impassable barrier in the shape of the prohibitions of a common table, as to which he himself admitted that Jehovah had given them to him for the very purpose of making difficult his communion with 'pagans'. (See Pseudo-Aristeas, 139, 142.)

¹This translation follows the original in distinguishing the terms Israelites (up to the time of the Babylonian captivity), Judeans (from the return from captivity to the time of Hadrian), and Jews (from the time of Hadrian to the present).

Even of his own nation, moreover, he rejected one half, women, regarding them as unworthy of the entire favour of Jehovah. No one who has become acquainted with Greek religion will ever forget the picture of the Greek priestess and prophetess; in this book we have been able merely to cast a passing glance at her, and for that matter at the priesthood in general, and yet I hope that the names of Theano and Diotima will not escape the reader's memory. If he wishes to enlarge his conception, let him compare with them the prophetess Theonoë in the Helen of Euripides, the Pythia in the Ion of the same author, or even the priestess of Aphrodite in the Rudens of Plautus. Israel in its most ancient times still had prophetesses such as Deborah, but towards the end of the kingly period the prophetesses of Israel were already busy with 'sewing pillows upon all elbows' (Ezekiel xiii. 18), and the result of the development was the well-known prayer of Rabbi Jehudah ben Ilai, who openly thanked God that he had not made him a woman. Yet one must admit that this circumstance did not in the least hamper Judaism among women during the epoch of proselytism : quite the contrary. This, however, is a riddle of another sort, one which finds its solution not in the history of religions, but in feminine psychology—and most readily in the fact that women like best not only the men but the religions that love them least.

Finally, even in his male community the Judean, in contrast to the Greek, understood the idea of good mainly in its negative sense, as a refraining from evil acts ; and as evil he regarded all that immediately or mediately, even in the most distant fashion, might offend against the Law. Thus there developed that peculiar morality of the Law, concentrated in innumerable precepts about keeping the Sabbath holy and about prohibited foods ; the Pharisee became the ideal of Jewish virtue.

There are necessary reservations also for the principle, ' god reveals himself in truth ', on the soil of Judaism. Thus, of course, God was truth for the Judean as well as for the Greek, and the Judean recognized divination and the existence of prophets. But in the first place, this principle found no corrective in the principle, ' the truth is God ' : the Judean found in his religion no spur to activity in the domain of knowledge ; for science Judaism was as fruitless as for art.—Later the Jews (not the Judeans) attained great results both in science and in art, and wrote many famous names on the tablets of progress; but this became possible for them only at the moment when, as a nation, they began to share in general human culture, and through it in Hellenism.

And in the second place, the danger from which the Greeks were protected by their organically negative attitude towards the devil, for a corresponding reason made itself felt in Judaism with terrible force: for the Judean his truth from the very beginning enters the confines of intolerance. This intolerance—let us say so at once—was the most fatal gift that Christianity received from Judaism.

And let us also say at once: When we have to deal with slavish souls, this intolerance becomes an important guarantee of success; hereby we may complete our first answer to the question as to the decline of the Greek religion. The intolerance of the Christian apologists, which would have exposed them to ridicule in the Athens of Pericles, acted powerfully on the slavish intellects of his successors six centuries later. We may verify this by an example from the comparatively recent past. Of all the sects of the Reformation the Socinians were beyond a doubt the most enlightened and the most attractive; as true sons of the Renaissance they inherited its tolerance as well as other qualities; and for that very reason they perished. The psychology of the matter is very simple.

' Tell me, Socinus, can I be saved if I am, let us suppose, a Calvinist ? '—' Certainly, provided that you are good and upright.'—' Thank you. And now tell me, Calvin, can I be saved if I am a Socinian ? '—' Certainly not : why did I burn Servetus ? '—' Then I will join Calvin : that is surer both ways.'—One must assume, I repeat, that we are dealing with a slavish soul.

One thing more I must remark at once : the fatal gift of intolerance, which Christianity had received from Judaism, proved to be a two-edged sword ; the Christians turned it against their own masters. Herein there is a great and terrible lesson : all the persecutions of the Jews that defile the history of the Christian religion have their source in the Old Testament. And conversely, words of tolerance in regard to them were spread abroad under the influence of a revival of the ancient view of the world : I may instance, in the epoch of the Renaissance, Reuchlin and his dispute with the men of Cologne ; in the epoch of neohumanism, Lessing. We have an impressive picture : the anti-Semite in his fanaticism acts, as it turns out, under the immediate or mediate influence of Judaism ; the humanitarian defender of the Jews, under the immediate or mediate influence of Hellenism.

Yet a humanitarian attitude to the adherents of a given religion does not exclude an objective criticism of that religion. A criticism of Judaism—brief, as is everything in this book—was indispensable in connection with our reply to the question why the Greek religion was supplanted by the Christian religion.

During the second, and still more during the first century before Christ, Hellenism encircled with a tighter and tighter ring the land governed by Zion ; under the last Asmoneans, and above all under Herod the Great, Judea became to a considerable degree a Hellenistic kingdom. If even in Jerusalem the zealous adherents of the Law, and the morality based upon it, had to contend violently against the ever-increasing influence of the ' Hellenizers ', then what must have been the temper of the border province on the upper Jordan, ' pagan Galilee ' (' Galilee of the Gentiles ') which had only recently submitted to the authority of the Law ? Here we can do no more than ask the question : Galilee in the epoch just preceding the birth of Christ is a great riddle for us.

But it is a fact that Galilee was wedged into Hellenism still more deeply than Judea itself ; it is a fact that the appearance of Christ came at the time of the strongest influence of Hellenism on the intellects of the Judeans ; it is a fact that His teaching was a protest against Judean attachment to the letter of the Law, in the spirit of Hellenic liberty, Hellenic humanitarianism, the Hellenic filial relation to a god whom men love. Every man's own scientific conscience may whisper to him the conclusion to be drawn from this.

Yet at all events Galilee gravitated politically towards Jerusalem—and it was the tragic dream of the Master to gather together her children 'even as a hen gathereth her chickens under her wings'. Hence the Judeo-Christianity of the first decades both in Palestine and in the diaspora; hence the fatal Judaization of Christianity, which also grafted on it a trait from which it could not free itself even in later times—intolerance.

Slowly, however, Judaism eliminated from its organism Christianity, which could not be reconciled with it: the Christian communities in Palestine perished, and in the diaspora the new teaching passed from the nucleus of Jewish communities to the ring of proselytes that surrounded them, and so farther and farther into that 'pagan world' with which it was much more nearly akin. The result of this passage was the fruitful process, pregnant with consequences, the nature and meaning of which has been explained by the scientific researches of the last century—the Hellenization of Christianity.

To be sure, this Hellenization of Christianity advances hand in hand with the destruction of Hellenism; the struggle of the two religions, which begins in the third century, is accompanied by frightful losses of the cultural values of humanity, at the very thought of which the heart bleeds. Amazement seizes us at the sight of that senseless, suicidal fury with which a people turned against all the most beautiful and most noble creations which it had itself fashioned from the very beginning of its existence on earth. The 'pagan' temples might have been adapted to Christian services—the example of the Parthenon proved this. No: the abodes of 'devils' must be destroyed. The fruits of the inspiration of Phidias, Praxiteles, and other artists might have been preserved as museum curiosities; an edict of the most Christian Emperor Theodosius even required this. No: the statues of 'devils' must be demolished. This visual beauty perished; and there perished also a whole literature that was related to the 'pagan' worship, all the liturgical hymns, all the writings of theologians and exegetes. The reader of even this little book should remember that what he has read in it rests on data derived from secular literature; that if we had in our hands the writings of the ancient prophets and expounders of the native religion, our survey of it would be as much more eloquent as an account of the history of ancient art would be more eloquent, if our museums, instead of late and for the most part mediocre copies, possessed the original works of Phidias and Praxiteles.

A simoon flew over the meadows and groves of Hellas; Hellas grew yellow and black. Yet it remained Hellas—and on the parched ground gradually there began to appear new shoots of the vegetation that had been destroyed. Despite fanatics, Christianized Greece regained the ancient gift of its Olympus, the revelation of God in beauty. To be sure, this beauty was very modest; humanity had to live through a new epoch of Daedali—but yet the seeds of the future were saved. The deity was split into three hypostases, in the empty heights of the heavens the Mother of God and the saints found a dwelling—and the contrast of Christian monotheism to ‘pagan’ polytheism became a mere illusion. The new cult began to shine with the colours of symbolic ceremonies, which were really only a pale recollection in comparison with the Panathenaea and Eleusinia that had gone forever—but yet they brought joy and comfort to the soul. The inquiring intellect began to search into the secrets of revelation, uniting the speculation of the Academy, the Lyceum, and the Stoa with the fundamental theses of the new religion; and, conducted by the Logos of ancient times, created Christian theology.—It is true that when thinking of it we can also hardly fail to remember excommunications and persecutions, executions and religious wars; but Hellas is not to blame for that. In itself the dispute of Arius and Athanasius over the nature of Christ was just as innocent as the dispute in earlier years between the Lyceum and the Stoa over the nature of the gods—as disputes there is a complete analogy between them. What distinguishes them is that the Christian dispute passed from word to deed, from argument to persecution; this is due to the unfortunate conviction that the salvation of the soul depends on the acceptance of one or the other theory, that one theory comes from God and the other from the devil. And whence that conviction arose we already know.

In truth, Hellenized Christianity, unfortunately for itself, could not rid itself of the erroneous identification of its God with the God of Abraham, could not free itself from the Old Testament, that great and remarkable book—which, however, can only gain in value in the eyes of a Christian if he ceases to regard it as a book of revelation. The blame was due to the Judeo-Christian delusion that the coming of Christ had been foretold by the prophets of the Old Testament—a delusion so thoroughly and so mercilessly overthrown by the common labour of both Jewish and Christian investigators of modern times. The medieval Church, perceiving the danger, did all that in it lay to avoid it: on the one hand, it developed the Hellenic elements of Christianity in ritual and theology, developed them successfully, at times even surpassing its model—I may instance the touching symbolism of the ringing of the evening bells, che pare il giorno pianga, che si muore, the majestic sounds of the organ, the meditative beauty of aspiring vaultings, the beneficence of charitable foundations with their quiet peace and active faith—and on the other hand, it tried so far as possible to make harmless the other source of its teachings. Yet it could not expel it altogether; its preservation threatened mankind, sooner or later, with the re-Judaization of Christianity.

This came in the sixteenth century; its name is—the Reformation.

For a second time the revelation of God in beauty was set aside; iconoclasm destroyed the church painting of the Middle Ages, it destroyed also the germs of its further development: Dürer, Cranach, and Holbein found no successors in Protestant Germany. The beautiful, symbolic ceremonies of the medieval Church were also destroyed: against psychology, but in the spirit of the synagogue, worship was reduced to nothing but the word. Nature was once more stripped of deity: there vanished the crucifixes that adorned the crossroads and the summits of hills, the chapels and the images or pictures of the Mother of God and the saints, which sanctified boundary lines and groves, rocky grottos and the cavities of ancient trees, and which reminded travellers of the presence of the deity.

The neohumanism of the eighteenth century brought in a reaction in this field as well as in others; its approach to antiquity inevitably involved an approach to Hellenic Christianity as well. Orthodox Protestants even to-day cannot be reconciled to the fact that Schiller becomes a 'Catholic' in The Maid of Orleans and Mary Stuart, Goethe a 'Catholic' in Faust, particularly in the second part of the work. But there was no help for it; the inexorable circle of evolution has been concluded, Judaized Christianity has overthrown itself in the last phase of its evolution, in the school of Harnack. It has admitted the justice of the prophetic words of Goethe: 'Gefühl ist alles.' Religious feeling is the kernel of religion; the rest is but a parable.

And this consciousness should force us to regard with dignity and love a religion which gave so wide and grateful a field to the religious feeling of the faithful, which was the first of religions to recognize the revelation alike in beauty, in goodness, and in truth, and which created that sacred triangle in which for us the eternally watchful eye of the deity reposes.

INDEX

- Abraham, 221.
 Academus, 111, 172.
 Academy, 10, 12, 181, 220 ;
 Middle, 172 ; New, 76, 200.
 Achæan epoch, 75, 81, 82, 99.
 Achæans, 118, 135.
 Acheloüs, 20.
 Achilles, 24.
 Acropolis, 49, 50, 57, 61, 75, 82,
 85, 105, 110, 128, 129, 211.
 Admetus, 43.
 Aeschylus, 12, 31, 49, 57, 64 ;
 Agamemnon, 68, 77, 118,
 119, 136, 142 ; Eumenides,
 5 ; Fragments, 31 ; Oresteia, 75 ; Prometheus, 52 ; Seven Against Thebes, 33.
 Africa, 30, 37.
 Agamemnon, 134, 187.
 Agonistics, 88, 106.
 Alaric, 211.
 Alastor, 142, 143.
 Alcamenes, 67.
 Alcibiades, 138.
 Alexander the Great, 120.
 Alexandria, 28, 59, 72.
 Ammon, 119.
 Amos, 194.
 Amphictyonic Council, 114.
 Amphictyony, 112-114.
 Amphidromia, 92.
 Amphitrite, 23.
 Anatomy, 204.
- Anaxagoras, 27.
 Anaximander, 19.
 Ancestors, spirits of, 94.
 Animatism, 62.
 Animism, 145.
 Antenor, 77.
 Anthesteria, 48, 89, 110, 145.
 Apaturia, 89, 97, 101.
 Aphrodite, 2, 28, 31, 42, 70,
 108, 129, 136, 137, 213.
 Apollo, 43, 44, 46, 55, 56, 59,
 64, 66, 69, 70, 75, 76, 80,
 84, 103, 114, 119, 120, 124,
 125, 126, 128, 129, 135,
 136, 151, 160, 172, 184, 185,
 188, 192, 193, 195, 199, 204,
 205, 206.
 Aquinas, St Thomas, 125.
 Arcadia, 21, 22, 43, 44, 64, 193.
 Arcadians, 9, 10, 43.
 Arcesilaüs, 172.
 Architecture, 80-83.
 Arcturus, 29.
 Areopagus, 210.
 Ares, 104, 119.
 Argos, 19, 20, 104.
 Aristæas, Pseudo-, 213.
 Aristophanes, Clouds, 7, 161 ;
 Frogs, 148, 149.
 Aristotle, 12, 163, 174, 176, 180, 181, 183, 185 ; Con- stitution of Athens, 34 ;

- Ethics*, 173; philosophy of, 173-177; Politics, 73.
 Arius, 220.
 Arrhephoroe, 105.
 Artemidorus, 193.
 Artemis, 11, 29, 40, 41, 42, 46, 70, 97, 103, 129, 134, 184; Amarynthia, 113.
Asclepiadae, 204.
Asclepius, 72, 203, 204.
Asia Minor, 32, 37.
Asmoneans, 217.
Astarte, 108, 212.
Astrology, 197, 198.
Asylum, right of, 116.
Athanasius, 220.
Athena, 2, 4, 7, 34, 48, 49, 50, 51, 52, 54, 55, 57, 59, 61, 70, 75, 76, 79, 82, 83, 84, 85, 104, 105, 107, 110, 119, 128, 129, 136, 152, 164, 182, 187, 211; Ergane, 50; Polias, 105; Poliouchos, 105; the Maiden, 68, 209.
Athenians, 52, 56, 68, 75, 78, 106, 107, 109, 117, 163.
Athens, 12, 18, 19, 20, 32, 34, 39, 46, 48, 50, 51, 52, 54, 60, 69, 82, 87, 95, 100, 102, 104, 108, 111, 114, 116, 117, 138, 143, 148, 177, 182, 215.
Atlas, 29.
Atoms, 177.
Attic comedy, 145.
Attica, 25, 30, 51, 111, 147.
Atticus, 186.
Augury, 191, 196-198, 204.
Augustine, St., 148.
Aurelius, Marcus, 186, 202.
*Autoclide*s, Exegetics, 79.

Baal, 197, 212.
Babylon, 8, 197.
Bacchantes, 150.
Bacchic dance, 150-152.
Bacchic mysteries, 25.
Bacchus, 2. See also Dionysus.
Bacides, 194.
Barbarians, 112.
Berosus, 197.
Boissier, 202.
Boötes, 29.
Boreas, 30.
Botany, 204.
Bouphonia, 45, 109.
Brutus, 186.
Bryaxis, 72.
Bull-slaying. See Bouphonia.
Byzantine Greece, 61.
Byzantium, 193.

Cadmus, 152.
Cagliostro, 4.
Callirrhoe, 18.
Callisto, 29.
Calvin, 216.
Calydon, 42.
Calydonian hunt, 42.
Cam, 18.
Carthage, 99.
Castalian stream, 127, 195.
Castor, 25, 29.
Catholics, 74, 76, 223. See also Christianity, Church.
Cato, 186.
Celeüs, 8.
Centaurs, 84.
Cephalus, 132, 144.
Cephisodotus, 19, 69.
Cephisus, 19, 39, 49.
Chalceia, 52.
Chalcis, 113.
Chaos, 170.
Charites, 163, 164.
Charles (river), 18.
Charms, 191.
Chernips, 93. See also Sprinkling.

- Chorea, 56, 85, 87, 88, 106, 150.
 Christ, 74, 75, 217, 218, 220, 221.
 Christianity, 3, 6, 16, 17, 37, 76, 86, 121, 156, 197, 211, 216, 218-223; Hellenization of, 218, 221, 223; Judaization of, 218, 222.
 Christians, 1, 74, 76, 78, 121, 211.
 Chryse, 135.
 Chryses, 135, 136.
 Church (Christian), 1, 156, 197, 221, 222.
 Cicero, Dream of Scipio, 185; On Divination, 200; Republic, 185.
 Cilla, 135.
 Cimon, 111, 117, 182.
 City-state. See Polis.
 Clan, 100.
 Classicism, French, 1.
 Cleomenes, 20.
 Clisthenes, 100.
 Cologne, 216.
 Comedy, Attic, 145.
 Common laws of Hellas, 112, 114-117.
 Conjuraton, 137.
 Copreus, 115.
 Cora, 46, 47, 85, 146, 147.
 Corinth, 18, 98, 111, 193.
 Corinthians, 108, 109.
 Corinthus, 111.
 Corporations, 102.
 Cos, 204.
 Cosmos, 170.
 Cranach, 222.
 Cretans, 134.
 Crete, 8, 54, 133.
 Creuzer, 4.
 Critias, 108.
 Croesus, 120, 196, 200.
 Cronus, 26, 159.
 Croton, 155.
 Crusoe, Robinson, 200.
 Curse, 136, 138.
 Cybele, 32, 120.
 Cyclops, 43.
 Cyllene, 29.
 Cynics, 76.
 Daedali, 162, 220.
 Daedalic statues, 66.
 Daedalus, 65, 160.
 Daemons, 171, 172, 192.
 Dance, Bacchic, 150-152.
 Dante, 156.
 Daphnis, 21.
 Deborah, 213.
 Delphi, 46, 55, 80, 81, 82, 85, 113, 114, 120, 194, 196, 199, 205.
 Delphic college, 55.
 Delphic epigram, 127.
 Delphic oracle, 104. See also Oracle (at Delphi).
 Delphic priestess. See Pythia.
 Delphinia, 54, 55.
 Demaratus, 199.
 Demeter, 3, 8, 12, 46, 55, 56, 64, 69, 72, 85, 91, 96, 97, 103, 119, 120, 121, 138, 146, 147, 149, 183, 210, 211; Demeter-Isis, 121; Thesmophoros, 47, 89.
 Demodocus, 128.
 Demons, 51.
 Demosthenes, On the Embassy, 69.
 Dendrites, 49.
 Determinism, 201.
 Devil, 22, 65, 207, 208, 215, 221.
 Diogenes, 148, 205.
 Diomedes, 75, 117, 128, 136.
 Dionysia, Great, 12, 48, 49; Rural, 48, 89.

- Dionysus, 2, 12, 47, 48, 49, 55, 61, 70, 83, 89, 110, 146, 150-153, 164, 211; Dionysus-Zagreus, 152, 153.
 Dioscuri, 25, 29, 104.
 Diotima, 8, 165, 213.
 Dipolia, 109.
 Dipyron Gate, 177, 182.
 Dirce, 18.
 Divination, 189-202.
 Dodona, Sybil of, 32.
 Dreams, 191-193.
 Dryads, 20, 62, 70.
 Duns Scotus, 125.
 Dürer, 222.
- Earth, 16, 22, 23, 26, 30-35, 39, 42, 46, 63, 83, 90, 97, 99, 140, 159, 160, 168, 169, 170, 174, 207, 212.
 Ecstasy, 150, 151.
 Egypt, 8, 121.
 Egyptian religion, 31.
 Egyptians, 63, 119, 137.
 Eiresione, 55, 56.
 Eleatics, 162, 164.
 Eleusinia, 147, 220.
 Eleusinian goddesses, 80.
 Eleusinian mysteries. See Mysteries.
 Eleusis, 8, 12, 47, 77, 85, 116, 120, 146, 147, 148, 149, 150, 155, 210, 211.
 Empedocles, 8, 162.
 Endor, Witch of, 193.
Enelysion, 80.
 England, 18.
 Epaminondas, 148.
 Epictetus, 202.
 Epicureanism, 177-182, 186.
 Epicureans, 76, 186.
 Epicurus, 10, 13, 34, 35, 163, 177, 180, 181, 183, 200. See also Epicureanism.
- Epimenides, 8.
 Epirus, 193.
 Erasinus, 20.
 Erechtheus, 82.
 Eretria, 113.
 Erinyes, 41, 64, 75, 94, 95, 128, 164.
 Eros, 30.
 Ethiopians, 77.
 Euboea, 113.
 Eumolpidae, 8.
 Euripides, 12, 49, 57, 58, 181; Alcestis, 92; Andromache, 143, 144; Helen, 213; Heracles, 162; Hippolytus, 42, 125, 142; Ion, 213; Iphigenia among the Taurians, 134, 192; Phaëthon, 92; Suppliants, 202.
 Eurus, 30.
 Euthyphro, 161.
 Exclusiveness, Semitic, 77.
 Ezekiel, Book of, 213.
- Family, 90-100. See also Marriage.
 Farnell, Higher Aspects of Greek Religion, 95, 96, 118, 119.
 Farnese Heracles, 71.
 Fatalism, conditional, 199.
 Fate, 167-169.
 Fear of God, 127, 128, 130, 158.
 Fetishism, 73, 74.
 Fire, in Stoicism, 183, 184.
 Firmament, 173.
 Forchhammer, 4.
 Fra Diavolo, 148.
 Francis of Assisi, St., 17.
 Free Will. See Will, freedom of the.
- Galilee, 217, 218.
Gamêlion, 97.

- Games, national, 114.
 Gehenna, 148.
 Germany, 222.
 Giants, 105, 159, 168.
 Gigantomachia, 160.
 Glaucus (sea-god), 25.
 Glaucus (ally of Trojans), 117.
 Goethe, 2, 3, 71, 223; Faust,
 3, 17, 77, 158, 223.
 Gorgons, 64.
 Gospels, 6.
 Graces, 163, 164.
 Gravitation, 173.
 Great Dionysia. See Diony-sia.
 Great Mother, 32, 120, 121.
 Gregory the Theologian, 121.
 Gretchen, 3.
 Groups, 102, 103.
 Gruppe, Otto, 13.
 Guinea, 73.

 Hades, 145, 148, 149, 165.
 Haeckel, 141.
Hagneia, 124.
 Halcyon, 54.
 Halys, 120, 200.
 Harmonia, 57.
 Harnack, 223.
 Hator, 119.
 Hearth, 90-93, 109, 113, 114.
 Heavens, 26-32.
 Hecatombs, 131, 132.
 Hector, 75, 118.
 Helicon, 57, 194.
 Helios, 27, 28.
 Hell, 148, 154.
 Hephaesteia, 52.
 Hephaestus, 52, 183.
 Hera, 2, 3, 12, 29, 68, 71, 91,
 95, 96, 97, 103, 104, 164,
 183; the Fulfiller, 68;
 Ludovisi, 71.
 Heracles, 67, 71; Farnese, 71.

 Heralds, 115.
 Heredity, 141-144.
 Hermes, 2, 21, 29, 43, 44, 52,
 53, 55, 59, 67, 70, 73,
 83, 115, 116, 204, 205;
 Hermes-Logios, 205.
 Hermetism, 205.
 Herod the Great, 217.
 Herodas, 89.
 Herodotus, 104, 119, 193.
 Heroes, worship of, 111.
 Heroism, philosophy of, 183, 186.
 Heroization, 145, 146.
 Hesiod, 8, 57, 91, 131, 162,
 203; Theogony, 160, 161,
 170, 194; Works and Days,
 39, 42, 43, 53.
 Hesperus, 28.
 Hestia, 90-93, 98, 100, 109,
 110, 117.
Hierodoulia, 108, 109.
Hikesia, 116.
 Hindus, 63.
 Hippocrates, 203.
 Hippolytus, 42.
 Holbein, 222.
 Holocaust, 93, 131, 133.
 Homer, 3, 12, 25, 57, 75, 81,
 89, 91, 99, 101, 123, 159,
 162, 168, 187, 188; Iliad, 67,
 68, 117, 118, 135, 136, 169;
 Odyssey, 124, 128, 168, 187.
 Homeric Epigram, 51.
 Homeric Hymn to Apollo,
 168.
 Horace, Epistles, 130; Odes, 132.
 Hospitality, 116, 117.
 Hymettus, 21.
 Hypermnestra, 31.

 Iamidae, 194.
 Ideas, Platonic, 164-167.

- Idolatry, 73-80.
 Idomeneus, 133, 134.
 Idothea, 25.
 Ilissus, 20.
 Ilium, 118.
 Immortality, 144-156, 165,
 176, 177, 185.
 Inachus, 19.
 India, 4, 8.
 International law, 117.
 Intolerance, 107, 108, 207,
 215, 216, 218.
 Ionians, 162.
 Iphigenia, 133, 134.
 Iran, 4.
 Irene, 69.
 Isis, 72, 119, 121.
 Islam, 6, 37, 163.
 Ismenias, 19.
 Ismenus, 19.
 Israel, 36, 67, 118, 123, 130,
 212, 213.
 Isthmus (of Corinth), 114.

 Jehovah, 118, 210, 213.
 Jehudah ben Ilai, 213.
 Jephthah, 133.
 Jerusalem, 217, 218.
 Jesus. See Christ.
 Jews, 78, 214, 216. See also Israel, Judeans.
 Job, 185 ; Book of, 140.
 John, Gospel of, 133.
 Jordan, 217.
 Jove, 2, 120.
 Judaism, 6, 16, 17, 86, 211-
 218. See also Israel.
 Judea, 217.
 Judeans, 212, 214, 215, 217.
 Julian the Apostate, 195.
 Juno, 2.

 Kant, 201.
 Koran, 6.
- Labrys*, 74.
 Lacedaemon, 111.
 Laconia, 64.
 Laius, 199.
 Lamb of God, 133.
 Lapithae, 84.
 Law, international, 117 ;
 Jewish, 214, 217 ; (nomos), 169.
 Laws of Hellas, common, 112, 114-117.
 Leibnitz, 201.
 Lelantian War, 113.
 Lemnos, 35.
 Lenaea, 48.
 Lermontov, 16.
 Lessing, 216.
 Leucothea, 25.
 Lichas, 115.
 Locri, 123.
 Logos, 163, 188, 189, 205,
 206, 220.
 Love of God, 128-30, 158, 217.
 Love, Platonic, 164-167, 172.
 Lucretius, De Rerum Natura, 35.
 Luther, 158, 176.
 Lyceum, 10, 12, 181, 183, 220.
 Lycurgus, 12 ; Against Leo- crates, 143.
 Lynceus, 31.
 Lysimachus, 120.
 Lysippus, 69, 71.

 Maecenas, 186.
 Magnesia, 76.
 Maia, 29.
 Mantic, 189-202.
 Marett, 62.
 Marriage, 68, 95-97, 144.
 Mars, 2.
 Massachusetts, 18.
 Mater Dolorosa, 3.
Materia, 207.

- Matter, 169, 170, 174, 175, 207.
 Meander (river), 19, 76.
 Medicean Venus, 70.
 Medicine, 203, 204.
 Medusa Rondanini, 64.
 Melampus, 8.
 Melissa, 193.
 Mercury, 2.
 Metanira, 8.
Miasma, 124-127.
 Mickiewicz, 110.
 Miltiades, 182.
 Minerva, 2, 59.
 Minos, 74.
 Minotaur, 54.
 Mishna, 16.
 Mnemosyne, 57.
 Mohammed, 37, 169.
 Moira, 168, 169.
 Monotheism and polytheism,
 163, 164, 183, 220.
 Moriae, 49, 50.
 Morpheus, 192.
 Mother Earth. See Earth.
 Mother, Great. See Great Mother.
 Mother of God, 3, 74, 75, 121,
 137, 220, 222.
 Motion, in Aristotle's philosophy, 173-175.
 Mouseion, 59.
 Müller, Max, 4.
 Müller, Otfried, 5.
 Musaeus, 8.
 Muses, 57-59, 85, 163, 194, 203.
 Music, 87, 88.
 Mysteries, Bacchic, 25; Eleusinian, 4, 8, 41, 47, 72, 114,
 121, 146-150, 158; Orphic,
 146, 152-156.
 Mythology, 1, 2. See also Religion, poetic.
 Naiads, 17, 18.
 Naples, 83.
 National games, 114.
 National unity, 112-117.
 Necromancers, 193.
 Nemea, 114.
 Neohumanism, 2, 216, 222.
 Neoplatonism, 139.
 Nereids, 24, 25.
 Nietzsche, 205.
Nomos, 169.
 Nostradamus, 17.
 Notus, 30.
 Nymphs, 17, 18, 20-22, 24,
 25, 57, 82.
 Oceanus, 27, 29, 145.
 Odysseus, 25, 38, 187.
 Oedipus, 196.
 Oeneus, 42.
 Oenomaüs, 84.
 Old Testament, 16, 67, 76, 194, 212, 216, 221.
 Olympia, 32, 67, 80, 82, 85,
 114, 164, 194.
 Olympians, 23, 32, 65, 72.
 Olympus, 22, 43, 57, 104, 168, 220.
 Omens, 189, 190, 198, 199.
 Ontonomism, 140, 142, 181, 185.
Opis, 124, 140. See also Providence, divine.
 Oracle (at Delphi), 104, 194-196, 199, 205, 206.
 Oreads, 22, 57.
 Orgies, 150, 151.
 Orion, 29.
 Ornithology, 204.
 Orpheotelestae, 155.
 Orpheus, 8, 152, 154, 156.
 Orphic mysteries. See Mysteries.
 Orphism, 155, 156, 160, 165,
 176, 185.

- Orthodox Christians, 74, 76.
 Oschophoria, 48.
 Osiris, 72.
 Ovid, Metamorphoses, 2, 3.

 Palestine, 218.
 Pallas. See Athena.
 Pallas Giustiniani, 70.
 Pan, 9, 22, 23, 25, 44, 64, 83, 188.
 Panathenaea, 50, 89, 105, 220.
 Panathenaic procession, 105.
 Pandarus, 187.
 Pantheism, 183.
 Paradise, 154, 165, 166, 185.
 Parnassus, 151, 194.
 Parthenon, 50, 68, 82, 105, 219.
 Pataecion, 148.
 Paul, St., 210; Epistle to the Ephesians, 96.
 Pausanias (author), 81, 85.
 Pausanias (King of Sparta), 193.
 Peleus, 24.
 Peloponnesian War, 50, 69.
 Peloponnesus, 27.
 Pelops, 84.
 Pentelicon, 21.
 Pergamum, 121.
 Periander, 193.
 Pericles, 60, 163, 209, 210, 215.
 Persephone, 152, 154.
 Perses, 39.
 Persians, 119, 120.
 Persius, 138.
 Pessinus, 120.
 Phaedra, 142.
 Phaedrus, 20.
 Phalerum, 48.
 Pharisees, 214.
 Pharmacology, 204.
Pharmakoi, 134.

 Pherecydes, 96.
 Phidias, 2, 67, 68, 71, 72, 77, 79, 80, 105, 158, 160, 162, 210, 211, 219.
 Philoctetes, 35.
 Philopappus, 57.
 Phoenicians, 108.
 Phratry, 100, 101.
 Phylonomism, 140-144, 181.
 Pindar, 155; Pythian Odes, 188.
 Pirene, 18.
 Pirke Aboth, 16.
 Pisarev, 168.
 Pisistratus, 48.
 Plato, 12, 38, 99, 103, 111, 130, 137, 138, 155, 156, 157, 162, 163, 167, 171, 172, 173, 180, 181, 186, 189, 209; Alcibiades II., 139; Apology, 107, 206; Euthyphro, 161, 162; Gorgias, 155; Laches, 197; Laws, 86, 95, 98, 110, 115; Phaedo, 155; Phaedrus, 20; philosophy of, 164-172; Republic, 132, 144, 155, 188; Symposium, 165.
 Platonic love, 165-167, 172.
 Platonism. See Plato, philosophy of.
 Plautus, Rudens, 213.
 Pleiades, 29.
 Plutarch, Alcibiades, 138; Cimon, 193; How a Young Man ought to hear Poems, 148; Theseus, 56.
Pneuma, 184.
 Poetry, 87, 88.
 Poland, 110.
Polis, 100, 103-112, 169.
 Pollution, 124-127.
 Polyclitus, 3, 68, 71.
 Polydeuces, 25, 29.

- Polytheism, 163, 164, 169, 220.
 Pompeii, 160.
 Posideon, 55.
 Posidon, 23, 25, 49, 54, 55, 66, 67, 71, 72, 82, 84, 104, 114, 129, 164, 183.
 Praxiteles, 67, 69, 70, 73, 162, 211, 219.
 Prayer, 135-139.
 Predestination, 201.
 Pre-Raphaelites, 66.
 Proclus, In Timaeum, 139.
Proērosia, 47.
 Prometheus, 27, 43, 52, 131.
 Prophesying, 191-196.
 Prophetesses, 213.
 Prophets, 8, 67, 80, 194; Hebrew, 6, 67, 76, 211, 221.
 Protestants, 74, 76, 157, 158, 223.
 Proteus, 25.
 Providence, divine, 124, 140, 179, 180, 185, 200.
 Proxeny, 117.
 Prytaneum, 109, 113, 114.
 Pseudo-Aristeas, 213.
Psychē, 184.
 Ptolemy Soter, 59, 72, 121.
 Punishments, of the deity, 139-150, 154-156.
 Purgatory, 154, 156.
 Purity, 124.
 Pyanepsia, 54, 55.
 Pyanepsion, 97.
 Pythagoras, 8, 138, 155, 188, 204.
 Pythagoreanism, 125.
 Pythagoreans, 126, 155, 188.
 Pythia, 127, 195, 213.
 Python, 43.
 Reason, in Aristotle, 173-177.
 Reformation, 215, 222.
 Religion, citizen's, 11; Egyptian, 31; Orphic, 176; philosophical, 10; poetic, 10, 29, 84.
 Renaissance, 215, 216.
 Renan, 73.
 Reuchlin, 216.
 Rewards of the deity, 139-150, 154-156.
 Rhea, 159.
 Ritualism, 125, 126.
 Rivers, 18-20.
 Rohde, Erwin, 5, 151.
 Romans, 30, 59, 132.
 Rome, 97, 120, 121, 186.
 Rural Dionysia. See Dionysia.
 Sabbath, 214.
 Sacrifices, 27, 93, 94, 131-134; human, 133, 134.
 Sainte-Croix, 4.
 Sappho, Ode to Aphrodite, 136, 137.
 Sarapis, 72.
 Satyrs, 21.
 Schiller, 2; Festival of Eleusis, 47; Gods of Greece, 3; Maid of Orleans, 223; Mary Stuart, 223.
 Schömann, G. F., 158; Griechische Alterthümer, 157, 164.
 Science, 203.
 Sculpture, 65-80, 83, 84.
 Scyros, 111.
 Sea, 23-26.
 Sectarianism, 14, 209.
 Selene, 27, 28.
 Semele, 152.
 Semitic exclusiveness, 77.
 Seneca, 186, 202; Epistles, 201.
 Servetus, 216.

- Sibyl (of Dodona), 32.
 Sibyls, 194.
 Sicyon, 104.
 Sinope, 148, 205.
 Sirens, 25.
 Slaves, 98-100.
 Socinians, 215.
 Socinus, 216.
 Socrates, 10, 20, 107, 108, 139, 148, 161, 197, 205, 206.
 Solon, 4, 33, 34, 69, 157.
 Sophists, 161, 162.
 Sophocles, 12, 49, 57, 61, 71,
 163, 210; Antigone, 98;
 Electra, 95; Oedipus at Colonus, 49, 50; Philo- ctetes, 16, 36; Trachiniae, 115.
 Soul, in Aristotle, 175, 176;
 in Plato, 165-167; in Stoi-cism, 184.
 Souls, worship of, 110, 111.
 Sparta, 102, 104, 111, 114,
 117, 138, 193.
 Spartans, 50.
 Spirits of ancestors, 94.
 Sprinkling, 93, 98.
 Stars, 28-30.
 State. See Polis.
 Stoa, 10, 13, 163, 182, 183,
 186, 200, 201, 220.
 Stobaeus, 122, 126.
 Stoicism, 182-186, 200-202,
 220.
 Stoics, 130, 186, 202.
 Sunium, 82.
 Supplication, 116.
 Swedenborg, 4.
 Symbolon, 117.
 Syria, 37.
 Syros, 96.

 Tarentum, 155.
 Tarquins, 120.

 Tartarus, 159, 160, 170.
 Taurians, 134.
 Telmissus, 194.
 Temples, 81-85.
 Tenedos, 135.
 Theano, 126, 138, 213.
 Thebes, 18, 19, 104.
 Themistocles, 104.
 Theodosius, 219.
 Theonoë, 213.
 Theophrastus, Characters, 190.
Theorikon, 106.
 Theseum, 52.
 Theseus, 54, 111, 142, 202.
 Thesmophoria, 47, 89, 97.
 Thessaly, 28, 43.
 Thetis, 24, 75.
 Thought, in Aristotle, 173,
 174.
 Thrace, 30, 150, 152.
 Thracians, 119.
 Thræsea, 186.
 Thucydides, 60.
 Timoleon, 98.
 Timotheus, 120, 121.
 Titanids, 26, 159.
 Titanism, 153.
 Titans, 26, 27, 29, 152, 153,
 159, 160.
 Tolerance, 163. See also Intolerance.
 Torah, 6, 211.
 Tribe (by descent), 100, 101.
 Trilemma, Stoic, 201.
 Triptolemus, 41.
 Tritogeneia, 105.
 Tritons, 24.
 Trojan War, 42.
 Trojans, 117.
 Trophonius, 202.
 Troy, 118.
 Truth (in god is truth), 188,
 189, 203; (in truth is god), 189, 203-208.

- Unity, national, 112-117; of all humanity, 117-121.
 Uranus, 26, 31, 159, 170.
 Venus, 2; Medicean, 70.
 Vesuvius, 160.
 Virgil, Aeneid, 201.
 Virtue, in Stoicism, 130, 186.
 Voltairianism, 172, 200.
 Wilamowitz, 5.
 Will, freedom of the, 178, 199,
 201.
 Winckelmann, 2, 3, 4, 9, 71.
 Winds, 30.
 Witch of Endor, 193.
 Xenophanes, 77, 78.
 Zagreus, 153.
 Zaleucus, 123, 132, 139, 144,
 157.
 Zeno, 13.
 Zephyrus, 30.
 Zeus, 1, 2, 3, 12, 16, 26, 29,
 30, 31, 32, 42, 45, 50, 67,
 71, 72, 74, 75, 77, 78, 80, 85,
 91, 95, 96, 104, 110, 114,
 115, 118, 119, 127, 129, 131,
 136, 139, 152, 159, 160, 161,
 164, 168, 174, 183, 184,
 187, 192, 196, 209;
 Herkeios, 93, 98, 100;
 Hikesios, 116; Homognios, 100; Zeus-Jove, 120; of the Garth, 93, 98, 100;
 Otricoli, 71; Polieus, 109;
 Zeus-Sarapis, 121; Xenios, 117.
 Zielinski, History of Ancient Culture, 6.
 Zion, 210, 217.
 Zoology, 204.

THEOLOGY LIBRARY
 CLAREMONT, CALIF.

21069

PRINTED IN GREAT BRITAIN
BY ROBERT MACLEHOSE AND CO. LTD.
THE UNIVERSITY PRESS, GLASGOW

21069

BL
781
Z5

Zieliński, Tadeusz, b. 1859.

The religion of ancient Greece, an outline by Thaddeus Zieliński. Translated from the Polish with the author's co-operation, by George Rapall Noyes. London, Oxford university press, H. Milford, 1926.

x, 285, [1] p. 23 cm.

1. Greece—Religion. 2. Civilization, Greek. I. Noyes, George Rapall, 1873-1952^{tr.} II. Title.

27-12716

Library of Congress

BL781.Z5

(51h $\frac{1}{2}$)

CCSC/lr

292

01069

